The SPEAKER pro tempore. A quorum not having voted, the Chair under the rule had the right to appoint tellers.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 62, noes 59.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The ayes have it.

Mr. HUNTON. A quorum has not voted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No proceedings under a call of the House, in the judgment of the Chair, require a quorum. The ayes have it, and further proceedings under the call are dispensed with.

Mr. KENNA. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the river and harbor bill.

Mr. RUSSELL, of North Carolina. Pending that, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion to adjourn was not agreed to—ayes 39, noes 69.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question recurs on the motion of the gentleman from West Virginia, that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of proceeding with the consideration of the river and harbor appropriation bill.

The question was taken; and there were—ayes 94, noes 8.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I raise the point that no quorum has voted.

Mr. KENNA. I move that there be a call of the House.

Mr. ATHERTON. Pending that, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The point having been made that no quorum voted the Chair, under the rule and practice of the House, was about to appoint tellers.

Mr. ATHERTON. I think it is very clear we can do nothing to-night. I move we take a recess till ten o'clock to-morrow.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That motion is not in order while the House is dividing.

Mr. KEIFER. Was the point made that there was no quorum?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York [Mr. VAN VOORHIS] made the point that a quorum had not voted on the motion of the gentleman from West Virginia; and the Chair will appoint tellers.

Mr. KENNA. As it is apparent there is not a quorum here, I move there be a call of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. But the gentleman from West Virginia must be aware the House is now dividing. A quorum did not vote, and the point having been made, the Chair was about to appoint tellers, and the result of the vote has not yet been ascertained.

Mr. KENNA. Does not the vote stand in the absence of a demand for tellers?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York makes the point that no quorum voted.

Mr. ATHERTON. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ATHERTON. It is whether pending the motion of the gentleman from West Virginia it be in order to move to take a recess?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. In the judgment of the Chair it is not in order to make that motion while the House is dividing. The Chair will appoint as tellers the gentleman from West Virginia, Mr. KENNA, and the gentleman from New York, Mr. VAN VOORHIS.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 117, noes 4.

Mr. ATHERTON. Before the Chair announces the result of the vote by tellers, I want to press the point as to whether I cannot make the motion to have a recess. If the House resolves itself into Committee of the Whole, I cannot make my motion unless the committee rises for that purpose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion to take a recess would not be in order with an ascertained want of a quorum on the records of the House. It requires a quorum to take a recess.

Mr. ATHERTON. Although a quorum does not vote on one proposition it does not follow that it will not vote on another proposition.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Nor can the Chair assume a quorum is present when a quorum has failed to appear. The Chair cannot entertain the motion or the suggestions of the gentleman from Ohio when the House is dividing, the result not having yet been announced from the Chair.

Mr. ATHERTON. I desire, Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio is not in order.

Mr. ATHERTON. I rose to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It was not in order for the gentleman to make a parliamentary inquiry while the Chair was engaged in ascertaining the result of the vote. The tellers report as the result of the vote on the motion of the gentleman from West Virginia—ayes 117, noes 4.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. No quorum.

Mr. TALBOTT. I move a call of the House.

Mr. ATHERTON. I renew my motion that the House take a recess until ten o'clock to-morrow.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That motion is not in order, because the vote just taken shows the absence of a quorum.

Mr. ATHERTON. A quorum did not vote on that proposition, but it does not follow that a quorum will not vote on another.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has no information except that furnished by the tellers as to the number of members present. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. TALBOTT,] that there be a call of the House.

Mr. ATKINS. Is that motion debatable?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks this motion is not debatable.

Mr. ATKINS. I was going to ask gentlemen to listen to me a moment. I suppose all the members of this House desire to get through with the necessary legislation and avoid an extra session. I know I do; and I have not found the first member of the House on either side who desires to so conduct the business as to necessitate an extra session. Now, I am very anxious to get this bill through so far as I am concerned; but I think there are measures more important than this bill. I have indicated heretofore that the bill in charge of the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] is more important than this; and yet I think this is an important bill. Still, from the temper of the House to-night and from the fact the point is made every time a vote is taken that a quorum is not present, I am satisfied no good will be effected here to-night; and I believe we would facilitate the public business if we were to take a recess until half past nine to-morrow morning.

Let us lay aside our temper; and if I can do that, I think most of the gentlemen of the House can. Let us take up this bill in the morning, and we can probably get through it in time to take up the bill of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX,] so as to finish both measures to-morrow. Then we can take up the agricultural appropriation bill. By that time the sundry civil bill will be ready, and by the time we get through with that the deficiency bill will be ready. By the time we get through with that the funding bill will be here from the Senate. Unless we are very expeditious indeed, before we can get through with all these bills, and act on them as we ought to, the time will come for this House to adjourn sine die. I hope my friend from Texas will meet my proposition in the spirit in which I have offered it, and I trust members will agree to this suggestion.

Mr. REAGAN. The suggestion made by the gentleman from Tennesse [Mr. ATKINS] seems to me a practicable one. Anxious as I am to proceed with this bill, I see no reason to expect that we can make progress with it to-night; and if we stay here to-night without progress on the bill, we shall be disqualified for business to-morrow. I therefore accept the proposition of the gentleman from Tennessee that we take a recess till half past nine o'clock to-morrow morning.

Mr. ATKINS. I modify my suggestion so as to fix ten o'clock instead of half past nine.

Mr. TALBOTT. I made the motion for a call of the House. I have observed with a great deal of pleasure the map of our business, as made by the gentleman having charge of this bill and the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. ATKINS.] It is not the first time since I have been a member that I have known a map to be laid out by individual members for the regulation of the business of this House.

Mr. ATHERTON. I demand the regular order.

Mr. TALBOTT. One moment. My motion is the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This debate is proceeding only by unanimous consent; and it must stop if the gentleman from Ohio objects.

Mr. TALBOTT. Very well, then; I call for a vote on my motion that there be a call of the House.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. TALBOTT, it was not agreed to.

Mr. ATKINS. I now move that the House take a recess until ten o'clock to-morrow morning.

Mr. KENNA. If there be no objection, I desire to withdraw my motion that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from West Virginia withdraws his motion; and the question is on the motion of the gentleman from Tennesse, [Mr. ATKINS.]

The question being taken, there were—ayes 98, noes 23.

Mr. TALBOTT. No quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The point is made that no quorum has voted.

Mr. ATKINS. Then I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, having put the question on the motion of Mr. ATKINS, said: The ayes seem to have it.

Mr. TALBOTT. I withdraw the point of order that no quorum voted.

Mr. ATKINS. Then I withdraw my motion to adjourn.

Mr. BRIGHT. I renew the motion to adjourn.

Mr. KENNA. I make the point that the gentleman cannot make the motion to adjourn pending the announcement by the Chair of the result of the vote on another motion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from West Virginia will hardly insist upon that point, as the Chair interrupted the announcement of a vote to allow the gentleman from West Virginia to withdraw his motion.

Mr. KENNA. I beg pardon of the Chair, but I do not understand the fact as the Chair states it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair withheld the announcement of the result in order to give the gentleman from West Virginia an opportunity to withdraw his motion; and the gentleman from Tennessee then moved to take a recess.

Mr. KENNA. I do not understand that the Chair withheld any announcement to give me an opportunity for anything.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If the rule be insisted upon, the gentleman from Tennessee has no right to withdraw his motion to adjourn. Under a strict construction of the rule, while the House is dividing upon it, the Chair is compelled to hold that the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] was in the possession of the House, was being voted on, and that it was not within his power to withdraw it.

Mr. COX. What has become of the motion of my friend from Tennessee for a recess?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That motion did not prevail, because the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. TALBOTT] made the point that no quorum voted.

Mr. TALBOTT. I withdrew that point.

Mr. ATKINS. I demand tellers on my motion for a recess.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No quorum having voted, the Chair would have been obliged, under the rule, to order tellers if the point had been made in time. But it comes too late, unless the gentleman states that he did make the demand in time.

Mr. ATKINS. I do not so state.

Mr. COX. Would it be in order to renew the motion for a recess till ten o'clock to-morrow?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The pending motion is that of the gentleman from Tennessee, that the House adjourn.

Several MEMBERS. That is withdrawn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman had no right to withdraw it, if objection was made; and at any rate the gentleman's colleague [Mr. BRIGHT] renewed the motion.

Mr. KENNA. Then I hope the motion to adjourn will be voted down, so that we may take a recess.

Mr. BRIGHT. I withdraw the motion to adjourn so that we may have a recess.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to withdrawing the motion to adjourn?

Several members objected.

The question being taken on the motion to adjourn, there were—ayes 53, noes 82.

Mr. TALBOTT. I call for tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. ATKINS. I now move that the House take a recess till ten o'clock to-morrow morning.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I ask my friend from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] to give way for one minute.

Mr. ATKINS. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I ask unanimous consent of the House to take up a Senate bill. [Laughter.] Mr. Speaker, I know this is an amusing proposition at this hour of the night, but I have not asked this House for such a favor at any time; I now ask this favor of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SINGLETON?]

Several MEMBERS. What is it?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to take up for consideration a bill the title of which will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate bill No. 1874, to provide for the erection of a public building in the city of Quincy, in the State of Illinois.

[Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Several members objected.

Mr. ATKINS. I move that the House now take a recess until ten o'clock to-morrow morning.

Mr. THOMAS. Pending that, I move the House adjourn.

The motion of Mr. THOMAS was not agreed to.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. ATKINS, there were—ayes 116, noes 26.

Mr. FROST. No quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The point being made that no quorum has voted, the Chair will appoint tellers.

Mr. HAWK and Mr. KING demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 131, nays 28, not voting 132; as follows:

YEAS—131.

So the motion for a recess was agreed to.

The following pairs were announced:

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky, with Mr. CARPENTER, the latter reserving the right to vote to make a quorum.

Mr. BLISS with Mr. KETCHAM, for the balance of the day.

Mr. HAWLEY with Mr. HOUCK, for the night session on the river and harbor bill; Mr. HAWLEY would vote against the bill.

Mr. FELTON with Mr. ATHERTON, on all questions for the day.

Mr. MULLER with Mr. BAILEY.

Mr. COVERT with Mr. CHITTENDEN.

Mr. HAMMOND, of New York, with Mr. EWING, indefinitely.

Mr. GOODE with Mr. LORING, for to-day and to-morrow.

Mr. BAYNE with Mr. MITCHELL, on the river and harbor bill; Mr. BAYNE would vote for it, and Mr. MITCHELL against it.

Mr. BAYNE with Mr. FROST, on all political questions until further notice.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Illinois, with Mr. O'REILLY, on the river and harbor bill.

Mr. BINGHAM with Mr. TAYLOR, of Tennessee.

Mr. ROBESON with Mr. MCKENZIE, who is called home by a death in his family.

Mr. NEAL with Mr. SINGLETON of Mississippi, on all votes relating to the river and harbor bill.

Mr. MANNING with Mr. ARMFIELD, on the river and harbor bill.

Mr. DICKEY with Mr. HARMER, on the river and harbor bill; Mr. HARMER would vote "ay," Mr. DICKEY "no."

Mr. HARMER with Mr. ELLIS, on political questions, until Wednesday, February 16.

Mr. BACHMAN with Mr. DICK.

Mr. JONES with Mr. LADD.

Mr. NICHOLLS with Mr. JOYCE.

Mr. VAN AERNAM with Mr. HENRY.

Mr. EINSTEIN with Mr. CLARK of New Jersey.

Mr. BLOUNT with Mr. CLAFLIN.

Mr. JAMES with Mr. O'BRIEN.

Mr. HUTCHINS with Mr. MORTON, to and including Thursday next.

The result of the vote was then announced; and accordingly (at eight o'clock and fifty-five minutes p. m.) the House took a recess until ten o'clock a. m. to-morrow.

MORNING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House resumed its session at ten o'clock a. m., (Wednesday, February 16,) Mr. BLACKBURN occupying the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. REAGAN. I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of further considering the river and harbor appropriation bill.

Mr. STEVENSON. I ask the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] to yield to me to call up a bill to which there will be no objection.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. KENNA, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled joint resolutions and bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 337) authorizing and requesting the President to extend to the Government and people of France and the family of General La Fayette an invitation to join the Government and people of the United States in the observance of the centennial anniversary of the surrender of Lord Cornwallis at Yorktown, Virginia;

A joint resolution (S. No. 152) granting the use of artillery, tents, &c., to be used at the soldiers' reunion to be held at Lincoln, Nebraska, in the month of September, 1881;

A bill (S. No. 711) amending the charter of the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. No. 6201) granting a pension to Thomas Worthington; and

A bill (H. R. No. 6942) to fix the time of holding the district and circuit courts of the United States for the western district of Texas.

THOMAS SNELL.

Mr. STEVENSON. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WHITE] withdraws the objection he made yesterday to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 6479) for the relief of Thomas Snell, and I ask that it be now considered.

Mr. REAGAN. I will not object if it leads to no debate.

The bill was read, as follows:

Whereas the circuit court for the southern district of Illinois did at the January term, 1879, render judgment against said Snell for the sum of $10,000, in favor of the United States, on a bond dated May 18, 1863, on which bond said Snell was surety for Captain S. H. Lunt, as quartermaster; and

Whereas the judge of said court and the district attorney have since certified that it is extremely probable that there was no defalcation on said bond; and

Whereas the pretended defalcation was the result of the failure of the officers of the United States to take possession of the papers and effects of the said quartermaster, at the time of his death, according to the requirement of the articles of war; and

Whereas the enforcement of said judgment would now be unjust: Therefore,

Be it enacted, &c., That the district attorney of the United States for said district be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to release, cancel, and satisfy said judgment and discharge of record all liability against said Snell because of said judgment or any proceeding under the same; and that said Snell be relieved and discharged in law from all liability because of said judgment or proceeding.

There being no objection, the Committee of the Whole was discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and the same was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. STEVENSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JUDICIAL DISTRICTS OF LOUISIANA.

Mr. ROBINSON, by unanimous consent, reported back from the Committee on the Judiciary the bill (H. R. No. 4050) to divide the State of Louisiana into two judicial districts, with Senate amendments thereto; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

PROFESSOR SPENCER F. BAIRD.

Mr. CARLISLE. There is a bill of the Senate on the Calendar of the Committee of the Whole, No. 1928, to provide for remitting the duties on the object of art awarded by the Berlin International Fishery Commission to Professor Spencer F. Baird. I ask that it be considered now, as there will be no objection to it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill will be read.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, directed to remit the customs duties chargeable upon the object of art given by His Majesty the German Emperor and King of Prussia to the Berlin International Fishery Exhibition, and by it awarded as the first grand prize of honor to Professor Spencer F. Baird, at the exhibition held in the city of Berlin, Prussia, in the month of June, 1880.

There being no objection, the Committee of the Whole was discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and the same was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CARLISLE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

EDWARD T. BROWNELL.

Mr. HAWK. I ask unanimous consent to have considered at this time House bill No. 1650, for the relief of Edward T. Brownell, which is now on the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill will be read.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay Edward T. Brownell the sum of $90, said sum being the amount of two drafts on the United States depository at Chicago, Illinois, drawn by R. J. Sweet, late pension agent, one draft of $30 payable to Syrena McDade, and one for $60 payable to Almira M. Bacon, both of said drafts being indorsed payable to Edward T. Brownell; and said drafts are still outstanding.

There being no objection, the Committee of the Whole was discharged from the further consideration of the bill; and the same ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HAWK moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NICARAGUAN CLAIMS.

Mr. WILSON. I am instructed by the Committee on Foreign Affairs to report for consideration at this time the bill (S. No. 1650) authorizing the President to make the necessary arrangements to carry into effect the convention between the United States and Nicaragua for the adjustment of claims which may be duly concluded between the two governments.

Mr. REAGAN. If that leads to no discussion, I will not object.

Mr. WILSON. I do not think it will lead to debate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill will be read.

The bill was read.

Mr. WILSON. I call the previous question on the bill.

Mr. WARNER. We might as well know a little something about it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] object to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WARNER. I do not object to its consideration; but before I am called upon to vote upon it I desire to have an opportunity to understand the bill.

Mr. WILSON. I demand the previous question.

Mr. WARNER. I should like to know something about this bill before I am called upon to vote upon it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair cannot undertake to answer in reference to the bill. Is there objection to its present consideration?

Mr. HENDERSON. Yes, I object.

Mr. WILSON. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry, if I can be heard amid all this confusion.

Mr. HAYES. I demand the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from West Virginia rises to a point of order, and he will state it.

Mr. WILSON. Is it not too late, Mr. Speaker, to object to the consideration of the bill? The title was read, and the Chair called for objections, and there were none. Then the bill was read through, and I submit it was too late to make objection.

Mr. COX. The gentleman from Ohio on this side did not object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. WARNER. I wish to have an explanation on a single point in reference to this bill before I am called upon to vote for it.

Mr. WILSON. Just one minute.

Mr. COX. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. REAGAN. I object to everything but the regular order, and I hope that will make an end to asking unanimous consent.

Mr. COX. I only rise, Mr. Speaker, for the purpose of stating to the Chair what I believe would obviate all this trouble. My friend from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] never made objection to the bill but merely rose for the purpose of asking for information concerning it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HENDERSON] on the left of the Chair and both the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HAYES] and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] have demanded the regular order of business.

Mr. WILSON. This has been recommended by the Department, and has passed the Senate.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ATKINS. I move by unanimous consent the amendments of the Senate to the Post-Office appropriation bill be taken up, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection, the bill (H. R. No. 6972) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes, returned from the Senate with amendments, will be taken from the Speaker's table, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and the amendments of the Senate numbered and ordered to be printed.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. REAGAN. I now insist, Mr. Speaker, on my motion that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, for the purpose of further considering the river and harbor appropriation bill.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Before that is done, Mr. Speaker, I should like to correct a formal amendment in a bill which has passed both Houses. It is a mere formal amendment, and I do not think there can possibly be any objection to it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois? [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I hope the mere formal amendment will be made.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not in the power of the Chair to accede to the gentleman's request when objection is made on both sides.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Did any one object to my request?

Mr. BRIGGS. Yes; I object.

Mr. REAGAN's motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. CARLISLE in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House resumes the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 7104) making appropriations for the construction, completion, repair, and preservation of certain works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes. The Clerk will report the pending amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. DAVIS.]

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 160, strike out "twenty" and insert "forty;" so it will read: "Improving harbor at Calumet, Illinois, $40,000."

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. What is the condition of that amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. It is whether the Committee will adopt it or not, which is the usual question on all amendments.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. But has not a vote been taken upon it?

The CHAIRMAN. There was an attempt to have a vote, but the gentleman from New York raised the question that no quorum had voted. The question, therefore, will be taken over again.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I demand a division.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Who calls for a division?

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I do.

Mr. BURROWS. The gentleman from New York certainly must misunderstand the matter. He voted against the amendment, and his side has carried.

The CHAIRMAN. But the gentleman from New York has a right to demand a division.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. If the gentleman will withdraw his amendment, or the House will agree to reserve the vote upon it until a quorum is present, that will obviate all further difficulty.

Mr. O'NEILL. I hope there will be no unanimous consent, but that we shall go on with the bill, paragraph by paragraph, until we have concluded action upon it. There is really no reason why the bill should not be acted upon without further delay.

Mr. REAGAN. I appeal to the gentleman from New York, as this is an important bill, to make such motions as he wants to correct the bill or modify or change such provisions of it as he objects to, but that he will allow the House to go on and proceed to its completion and not obstruct it by putting his single will in opposition to the wishes of the majority who desire its passage.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I desire to say, Mr. Chairman, that the insinuations made by the gentleman from Texas or anybody else that I am making factious opposition to this bill are false. I have not made any dilatory motions whatever except such as I thought were absolutely necessary in the consideration of a bill of the magnitude and importance of this, on the ground that I believe in its consideration there should be a quorum here present; and I say now in justification of the course which I have pursued here that those who want the bill to pass, but who keep out of the way as if trying to avoid, apparently, the responsibility of voting for it, ought to be required to come here and show their hand.

Mr. REAGAN. I sincerely hope that gentlemen will permit the bill to be proceeded with. I do not desire to be understood as making any insinuation against the gentleman from New York or anybody else. I simply appeal to gentlemen to allow the bill to be proceeded with that we may go on without obstruction and not undertake to defeat the manifest will of a majority of the House by interposing motions which can only have the effect of delaying the public business.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I desire to say, Mr. Chairman, that for the present I shall withdraw the objection which I have made to the absence of a quorum.

Mr. NEW. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The point as to the absence of a quorum is withdrawn.

Mr. NEW. The gentleman from California [Mr. PAGE] said last night that if a recess should be taken until this morning there would be no further dilatory action or obstruction to the consideration of the bill. I hope the gentleman for whom that promise was made will not now forget or ignore it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Indiana that the call for a quorum is withdrawn by the gentleman from New York who made the demand. The Clerk will read the pending amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving harbor at Calumet, Illinois, $40,000.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to this paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 160 strike out "twenty" and insert "thirty;" and at the end of the paragraph add the words "of which $10,000 shall be expended in straightening the river and deepening the channel inside the harbor."

Mr. ALDRICH, of Illinois. I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that when this harbor was opened there were no railroad bridges there. There was scarcely any business done at this point. It was comparatively an unimportant place, and was originally built as a harbor of refuge. Since that time three railroad bridges cross the river near the harbor, while above the bridges is a very sharp bend in the river, which was of no particular consequence until the river became necessary for the business of the vast manufacturing interests congregating at the place. Now, this bend, which I think is not a quarter of a mile across, requires a circuit to be made of quite or nearly a mile, in consequence of the railroad bridge and the difficult navigation there. This is a very important improvement, and earnestly demanded by the needs of the manufacturing interests there above the bend. It ought to be done. It is just, and I simply ask $10,000 in addition to what is given already. In point of fact we should have $50,000. The total amount, if the amendment which I have suggested be adopted, only makes this appropriation $30,000, and I hope the committee will adopt the amendment.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire, Mr. Chairman, to call the attention of the committee, for I do not want it to make any mistake in this matter, to the fact that the amount given in this bill for improving the outside harbor at Chicago is $150,000. We have already a good inside harbor, but the gentleman desires that the work in the Chicago harbor——

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Will the gentleman from Texas permit me to correct him. My colleague is referring to the harbor at Calumet, Illinois, and not to the harbor at Chicago.

Mr. REAGAN. I understood the reference to be to the harbor at Chicago.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Illinois. I must have been very unfortunate in my remarks that the gentleman from Texas should so have misunderstood me.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. ALDRICH.]

The amendment was again read.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 31, noes 65.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving outside harbor at Chicago, Illinois, dredging in outer harbor, and constructing exterior breakwater, $150,000.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I offer an amendment to this paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 164 strike out the words "fifty thousand dollars" and insert the words "forty thousand dollars, and the further sum of ten thousand dollars for the improvement of the inner harbor."

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I wish, Mr. Chairman, to call the attention of the committee for a few moments to the fact that I have supported this bill in its entirety and desired it to pass under a suspension of the rules, for the reason that I believed it to be as fair a bill as we would be likely to get. Not that I was entirely satisfied with the bill, or that all the items contained in it were such as I would commend. I believe I could make reasonable complaint in some cases; but I thought it very probable that it was the best bill that would be presented to the House for its consideration. As it is now before the House, however, and being read by sections and subject to amendment, I simply desire to ask the attention of the committee for a moment to the appropriation which has been made for this harbor at Chicago, and ask that a portion of the fund set apart for this improvement shall be applied to the improvement of a portion of the inner harbor, which stands in much need of it. The appropriation of $150,000 at this time is ridiculously small; but I have not asked, as will be seen from the amendment, to increase the total sum. I simply ask that $10,000 of the $150,000 be diverted in such manner as to dredge out what is known as the main branch of the river for about three-quarters of a mile to a width of about three hundred feet. This is the channel through which more than 12,000 vessels annually pass to reach the forty miles of docks in the city where they have to discharge their cargoes, receive freight, and repass to the lake. It is this narrow channel through which over eight millions of tonnage pass each year that I ask a small amount to dredge out so that there shall be a channel about three hundred feet wide seventeen feet deep, instead of about seventy-five feet wide as at present.

Mr. DUNNELL. I wish to ask the gentleman from Illinois if there is anything in the report of the engineers that would justify that relative use of the money?

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I will say in the general report before the House there is no reference whatever in regard to this. Be it remembered that at the last session of Congress the Engineer Department was instructed to make a survey of this river and ascertain what was required; and Major Leydecker, in a supplementary report, has reported that it requires about fifty thousand dollars to complete a channel three hundred feet wide and seventeen feet deep, the entire length.

But I understand further, because I do not wish to misstate the position of the Engineer Department, that Major Leydecker, the engineer in charge of the work, has reported against making this appropriation. I do not understand, however, Mr. Chairman, how it is possible for an engineer officer in one locality to report differently on a subject of this kind from what an engineer officer will report at another similar work; for all their instructions emanate from the same source, and they receive their orders from the same headquarters. It will be noticed in the report before the House, and I do not make the comparison for the purpose of injuring any locality, that there are rivers that are being improved throughout the country where the property on each side of the river belongs to private parties, one of the principal reasons cited by Major Leydecker why this work should not receive governmental aid——

Mr. REAGAN. I desire simply to say there is no estimate and no recommendation for this; and I will say in addition, I am informed that the city authorities claim jurisdiction over this river; and with the numerous bridges built by the city authorities it would be a serious question whether it would not be resisted by the principal interests of the city of Chicago. And it is a channel that is within the suburbs of the city. There is no estimate, and there is an adverse report.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I would ask, would not the objection of the gentleman from Texas apply to the Schuylkill River, where there is a report of the engineer asking for $50,000 a year for many years to come?

Mr. REAGAN. I do not know in regard to the Schuylkill that there is any opposition by the city authorities of Philadelphia. And there has been a survey and estimate for the Schuylkill River and none for this.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I believe we have had a survey of this river and an estimate of the cost, as shown by Major Leydecker's report. Our city authorities do not oppose this improvement; the channel is not in the suburbs, but in the heart of the city.

The question being taken on the amendment offered by Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois, there were—ayes 40, noes 49.

So (further count not being called for) the amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read the following:

Improving Monongahela River, West Virginia and Pennsylvania, $25,000; but this sum shall not be expended until the Monongahela Navigation Company shall have undertaken in good faith the building of lock and dam number 7, at Jacob's Creek, and until said company shall, in manner satisfactory to the Secretary of War, give assurance of their ability and purpose to complete the same.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. I move to strike out the paragraph just read. Here, Mr. Chairman, is a bad case of splatter-dock navigation. It is not proposed to make this stream navigable. It is not suggested that it ever was navigable, or ever can be navigable for anything under heaven but rafts and flat-boats, after the money estimated shall have been expended amounting to $164,000.

Now, it seems to me that there should be a line drawn somewhere. If the United States is to go into the business of improving every stream navigable for flat-boats and rafts by a system of locks and dams there is not money enough represented in the national debt multiplied by twenty-five to accomplish the purpose. Here is what the engineer says of this stream:

Owing, however, to the fact that this dam is several miles above the upper terminus of the slack-water system on the lower Monongahela the navigation through the lock has thus far been limited to the passage of rafts and flat-boats.

Mr. KENNA. I shall not detain the committee with reference to this matter further than to say that the Monongahela River is navigable in Pennsylvania and some distance into West Virginia. There is a lock and dam in the river built by the United States some miles above the continuous navigation. It requires two locks and dams to complete the improvement. The Monongahela Navigation Company have agreed to build one of these locks and dams, and the bill contains a provision that the company shall construct one and the Government the other. I think this is almost the only instance in the improvement of rivers and harbors throughout the country where private enterprise undertakes to go hand in hand with the Government, bearing an equal proportion of the expense.

Mr. ATHERTON. I desire to ask a question for information simply. It is whether this navigation company have a right to charge tolls on that stream?

Mr. KENNA. I presume they have over that part of the stream which their works reach. They have no control over that part of the stream improved by the Government.

Mr. ATHERTON. Are the improvements now proposed to be made above those of the navigation company?

Mr. KENNA. They are. They are between those of the navigation company below and those of the Government above. The Government has already improved the navigation above, and the navigation company has improved it below; and the purpose of the two locks and dams provided for in this bill—one to be built by the Government and the other by the corporation—is to close the gap between the two improvements so as to make them both available.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. If I can discuss the pending amendment I desire to do so; otherwise I will move an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. But two minutes' time remain for the discussion of the pending amendment.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Then I move to strike out the last word. I think this is the river to which I referred yesterday. I am of the opinion that it would be an act of justice to those who own corporate rights on this river that they should have compensation for their works. I rise, however, for the purpose of ascertaining whether the Committee on Commerce would be willing to allow an amendment to this clause similar to the one adopted in regard to the Louisville and Portland Canal.

Mr. WILLIS. The Louisville and Portland Canal was owned by the Government of the United States.

Mr. KENNA. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] that on several occasions the Committee on Commerce has investigated this matter very carefully, and they have always acted in reference to the Louisville and Portland Canal and other canals of a similar character as a whole; and this bill is now presented to the House in the shape which the committee prefers.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I am in hopes that before the consideration of this bill shall have been concluded some such amendment as I have indicated will be adopted. This corporation, as I am told, has been entitled to the privilege of collecting tolls for thirty years past, and has collected enough to pay more than twenty times the value of the works they have erected. While I would not be willing to withhold any appropriation which may be regarded as necessary to keep open the navigation of this river, I feel that there should be some provision inserted in the bill somewhere by which these works may be appraised and devoted to the public use.

Mr. ATHERTON. I would inquire of the gentleman if the rights of this company are so limited that they cannot tax business out of existence if they see fit?

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I understand that to be the case, as I asserted yesterday. I am told that 48,000,000 bushels of coal went down this river to the Ohio River, and paid taxes to this corporation. I desired to call attention to the matter.

Mr. ERRETT. The Monongahela Navigation Company is a State corporation, and this Government cannot interfere with its rights conferred by State law.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Then why ask the Federal Government to support the corporation?

Mr. ERRETT. The Government does not support it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. We are asked to appropriate the public money for this improvement.

Mr. ERRETT. This appropriation is to construct additional dams on that portion of the river which is in West Virginia, entirely independent of and beyond the scope of this corporation.

Mr. McMILLIN. I most sincerely hope that at some stage of this bill those in favor of its passage will consent to some amendment by which, when we make an appropriation for the improvement of a river or a harbor of this country, it will not be to build up some private interest or corporation or to strengthen a monopoly already in existence.

The principal ground upon which a member of this House can justify the appropriation of from five to ten millions of dollars a year for the improvement of rivers and harbors is to be found in the fact that thereby will be given to the people of this country free means of transportation that cannot be scooped up or consolidated with some private company and taken away from them. When the Government joins with a corporation and gives it the benefit of the people's money, they have no refuge, and we will have come to a sad day in our public affairs.

Day after day we hear of telegraph companies combining. Week after week news is received of new railroad "scoops" and railroad consolidations. The rivers and waters of our wonderful Republic are the only commercial channels which have not come under the control of consolidating influences. Let us not now yield them up too, and thereby make the surrender complete.

Mr. SAMFORD. Will the gentleman allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. McMILLIN. With pleasure.

Mr. SAMFORD. Propose an amendment of a general character at the end of the bill.

Mr. COX. You write out such an amendment.

Mr. McMILLIN. I will be in favor of it and intend to prepare and offer such an amendment if no one else does. I desire to state in the hearing of the chairman and the members of the Committee on Commerce that I voted for the last appropriation bill for the improvement of rivers and harbors, and the other day I voted to suspend the rules and pass this bill. I did so because I believed that at this day, when every right of the private citizen is threatened by corporate monopoly, when every means of transportation is about to be closed, organized against his interest, by corporations, it behooves Representatives to try to provide that the water highways which Heaven has furnished for the transportation of the people's commerce shall be left free for their use.

Now, when I find, as I have found in the progress of the discussion of this bill, that it contains in a slight degree the very evil of which we have complained, of which we have tried to rid the country, I shall do all I can to amend it, and will never vote for any independent measure the effect of which is to join hands with corporate monopolies, whether it be a monopoly in telegraph lines, in railroad lines, or in water lines of communication.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted on the pending amendment.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I will withdraw the amendment.

Mr. VALENTINE. I renew it.

Mr. REAGAN. If we cannot soon get a vote on this amendment I will move that the committee rise to close debate.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] withdrawing his formal amendment?

There was no objection.

Mr. VALENTINE. I renew the amendment. I understand that the situation of affairs upon this river is this: the State of Pennsylvania has chartered a corporation which is known as the Monongahela Navigation Company. That corporation has erected dams, and has charged tolls up to a point near the line between the States of Pennsylvania and West Virginia. It is now proposed by this bill to make an appropriation to improve the navigation of this river in West Virginia beyond the point controlled by this navigation company.

But the proposition is to improve a river at a certain point in West Virginia for the benefit of commerce, which when it reaches a certain point in Pennsylvania must pay a toll. In other words, it is proposed that the Government of the United States shall improve in West Virginia a river on the commerce of which the State of Pennsylvania has laid an embargo. I say it is unjust, and it is wrong. As a matter of principle the Government of the United States ought not to expend a single dollar upon any river passing through two or more States, if either of those States lays an embargo in the way of toll upon the commerce of that river. I hope the amendment will prevail.

Mr. MARTIN, of West Virginia. I will inform the gentleman that the State of Pennsylvania has no control over that part of the river lying within the State of West Virginia.

Mr. VALENTINE. I understand that; but the gentleman, who represents a portion of West Virginia, must remember that whenever the commerce upon that river which it is proposed the Government of the United States shall improve reaches the State line of Pennsylvania it finds an embargo laid upon such commerce. Is not that the fact?

Mr. MARTIN, of West Virginia. Then the argument of my friend is that because in years past a corporation in the State of Pennsylvania may have had charge of one portion of a very important navigable stream, therefore the Government must never improve the rest of it. I maintain that we must have the river navigation improved all over this country, so as to afford competition with railroad transportation.

Mr. VALENTINE. And I maintain that the Government of the United States ought not to expend a single dollar for the improvement of any water-course passing through two States or more where one of those States lays an embargo upon that commerce.

Mr. WISE. I wish to inform the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. VALENTINE] that he is mistaken when he supposes that any commerce coming from West Virginia and passing over this improvement in Pennsylvania is required to pay toll. I insist that there is a law on the statute-book of Pennsylvania which prevents the tolling of any trade passing in that way over the Monongahela River. The river is free to any trade coming from the State of West Virginia. Hence, the gentleman's statement is an entire contradiction of the real situation. All trade coming upon the Monongahela beyond the State line goes free through that improvement in the State of Pennsylvania. If I had a little time, I could produce the statute to that effect.

Mr. VALENTINE. The gentleman's colleague has not so stated the case.

Mr. WISE. I can show the law.

Mr. SPRINGER. If this formal amendment is withdrawn, I renew it.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not withdrawn.

Mr. VALENTINE. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska proposes to withdraw his formal amendment. Is there objection?

Mr. REAGAN. Let us have a vote.

The question being taken on Mr. VALENTINE'S motion to amend the amendment by striking out the last word, it was not agreed to.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move to amend by striking out all except the last word. Mr. Chairman, I have not offered any factious opposition to this bill. I voted against its passage under a suspension of the rules for the reason that it contained just such clauses as the one now proposed to be stricken out. I am in favor of liberal appropriations for the improvement of such rivers and harbors as are useful for interstate or foreign commerce. Further than that I do not believe we have a right to go; further than that, I think, in the interest of all the people and in the interest of economy, we ought not to go.

The provision which it is now proposed to strike out is this:

Improving Monongahela River, West Virginia and Pennsylvania, $25,000; but this sum shall not be expended until the Monongahela Navigation Company shall have undertaken in good faith the building of lock and dam No. 7, at Jacob's Creek, and until said company shall, in manner satisfactory to the Secretary of War, give assurance of their ability and purpose to complete the same.

By this provision it would seem that the Government of the United States is about to go into partnership with a private navigation company to improve something like slack-water navigation upon one of the streams of Pennsylvania and West Virginia; and I would like to ask what provision there is in the bill to prevent the navigation company from charging as toll any sum it may see fit in order to make profitable its investment in the improvement of this navigation. The Government is here going into partnership with a private corporation to make certain streams navigable. I have never known a private corporation entering into business without expecting to make that business profitable; and if this corporation is to make this investment profitable, it can only be by charging tolls upon the commerce passing over this stream. Now, I wish to ask the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA] whether commerce coming out of this stream (for I believe none can go into it unless it goes up hill) is to pass through locks and dams provided by a private navigation company; and if so, must that commerce pay toll to the navigation company for such service?

Mr. KENNA. Now, if the gentleman will allow me, I will answer his question. Of course the commerce of that river must go through the locks and dams erected by this corporation if it goes entirely out of the river; but it is a fact that the improvement provided for in this bill reaches a part of the river which is not controlled by the corporation. It is also stated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WISE,] who says he has investigated the matter, that while the company has no control over that part of the river which is reached by this improvement, it has by charter no control over the commerce which goes to that part of the river from West Virginia, and that corporation cannot be in any wise affected for good or for evil by the prosecution of this improvement, except to the extent of their own improvement in Pennsylvania, by the building of one more lock, while the Government extends it above by building an additional lock there.

Mr. SPRINGER. I do not understand the gentleman from West Virginia to answer my question.

The CHAIRMAN. One gentleman will please address the committee at a time.

Mr. SPRINGER. I have the floor, as I supposed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. ATHERTON. I should like to understand this matter a little more fully than I do, for it seems absolutely certain the matter of making this appropriation must in any event and on any explanation which has been given to the House be simply in favor of this appropriation. We have not yet been told whether the right to charge toll was limited by law. As a matter of course, the way in which this company would be benefited by this appropriation would be in the increased amount of commerce that would go down that stream, and if it be simply in that regard, then the appropriation of $25,000 is substantially a benefit to this corporation and there is substantially given to them the benefit of that much money. It gives them the right to charge tolls upon that much more. According to the amount to which the commerce of this stream is augmented, just to that extent will it be for the benefit of this corporation, which will be able to charge its tolls on that much more which passes over the bosom of the stream. If they have the right to charge any tolls they choose to charge, then it goes still further. It enables them to charge just such tolls on their portion of the river as will effectually keep commerce from the stream or make it pay toll equal to its value in passing over the stream. So in either event it is simply calling on the people of the United States to aid a corporation in respect to this appropriation, and it does seem to me whatever is done with river and harbor bills no such appropriation as this should be made that secures nothing to the United States, but is an effort to give to the company the full benefit of this appropriation.

The question recurred on the amendment of Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 33, noes 63.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. I should like to have tellers on that amendment.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa, and Mr. KENNA were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 37, noes 105.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. FORT. I desire to offer an amendment to come in after the paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

Nor until said company shall agree that the United States may regulate the rate of toll on said river.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I move the committee rise, as the hour of eleven o'clock has arrived.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is on the floor, addressing the committee.

Mr. MARTIN, of West Virginia. I wish to make a point of order on that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MARTIN, of West Virginia. I submit the Clerk had passed over the paragraph and commenced reading the next one.

The CHAIRMAN. But the gentleman from Illinois was on his feet addressing the Chair when the Clerk proceeded to read the next paragraph.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I rise to a point of order, that the legislative day has expired.

The CHAIRMAN. It has not until the House has adjourned.

Mr. KENNA. I hope the committee will remain in continuous session until we have finished this bill.

Mr. FORT. Mr. Chairman, I do not expect this amendment will be adopted, but I do wish to test the sincerity of the chairman of the Committee on Commerce in his efforts to regulate the tolls and charges on commerce. For if this amendment of mine be voted down it will be manifest this appropriation has been made for the especial benefit of this company and not for the benefit of the people.

Now, sir, there can be no reason if the Government expends a large sum of money for the benefit of this private corporation why it should not surrender to the Government the right to regulate the rate of tolls, a principle which the chairman of the Committee on Commerce is endeavoring to force upon the country, but which I see he is indisposed in this instance to take notice of or to give it his support.

Mr. COX. I rise to a point of order that the legislative day is done.

The CHAIRMAN. The legislative day has not expired until the House sees proper to adjourn. It is frequently in continuous session, as the gentleman is aware, for two or three weeks.

Mr. COX. I wanted the opinion of the intelligent gentleman now occupying the chair to stand as a precedent.

Mr. LOUNSBERY. Mr. Chairman, I hope this amendment will not be adopted by the committee. I can scarcely conceive of an evil which, as a precedent, could be inflicted upon this country greater than the adoption of this amendment. The provision inserted in the bill as it now stands provides that these corporations shall receive the benefit of certain improvements which it is proposed to make appropriations for in certain navigable waters. That is bad enough, but in my judgment it will be worse for the Government to enter upon a scheme of the kind suggested by this amendment which endeavors to give an equity to what must always, to a fair man, seem to be a very improper kind of legislation. If we adopt this amendment from year to year we will go on creating benefits for corporations and claim the right to control and regulate their actions. A more vicious system, a more vicious scheme, I can scarcely conceive could be presented or entertained upon this floor than this looks to accomplish.

Mr. Chairman, if we consider the Constitution under which Congress must act, if we are giving voice in our legislative action to the recognized principles and established theories of our Government, it seems to me that gentlemen will pause and consider carefully before they incorporate upon a bill of this character any such provisions as is proposed by this amendment. I am bound to assume that the clause in this bill is exceptional. It can only survive and become a law when coupled with other schemes in which gentlemen are interested and which they can only save by joining hands with this and kindred propositions. I think now that it is a very unwise way to take this exceptional case and put upon it a vicious amendment such as this.

Mr. ATHERTON. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ATHERTON. I must ask that there be order in the committee. I am desirous of hearing the argument of the gentleman from New York. I was desirous of hearing the amendment read, but could hear neither.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to state that the confusion is the result of the action of the gentlemen themselves upon the floor who persist in talking, and thus obstruct the public business. If gentlemen are desirous of continuing conversation while the public business is under discussion in the House the Chair must request that they retire to the cloak-rooms.

Mr. LOUNSBERY. I was proceeding to state, Mr. Chairman, that it is to-day a question of grave doubt whether the United States Government has the power to give life to a corporation or create one; whether the power is contained under the Constitution to incorporate a company for other purposes than those which may be necessary to carry out the functions of the Government itself. This power is certainly not contained in the express language of the Constitution. It can only be argued from such clauses as may require a corporation for carrying out the express grants of certain powers. For instance, a corporation, it has been held, may be created by the Federal Government for the purpose of carrying the mail.

I think this a stretch of the express language of the Constitution. The national banks are incorporated by the United States Government, and if their charter of incorporation can be maintained, it must be under the general power of coining money, or under the general provision for the national defense. There must be an implied grant growing out of the express grant itself. Here, however, is a corporation created by the State of West Virginia——

Mr. KENNA. By the State of Pennsylvania.

Mr. LOUNSBERY. Or the State of Pennsylvania, as is suggested, and by the clauses in this bill it is provided that the Government shall do certain works of which that corporation shall receive the benefit. A more vicious, inequitable, and unfair provision of a bill I imagine could scarcely be attempted to be incorporated; and yet, inequitable and unfair as it is, I think it is not so dangerous or inequitable as this amendment which proposes to interfere with these corporations and control their actions and powers by the General Government.

Mr. ATHERTON. I ask that the amendment offered by the gentleman on the other side be again read. As I stated before to the Chair, I was unable to hear it when it was reported from the desk in consequence of the confusion in the Hall.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the proposed amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

It is proposed in line 176, after the word "same," to insert "nor until said company shall agree that the United States may regulate the rate of tolls on said river.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. COX. I offer an amendment to this paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the word "dollars," in line 170, and insert in lieu thereof "Provided, That no portion of the said sum of $25,000 shall be so applied until the Secretary of War shall be satisfied that no part of the said river so improved is subject to the exaction of tolls by any private corporation or otherwise for its use."

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, on yesterday I endeavored by an amendment to carry out the spirit and intent of this amendment. I failed. Every member who has suggested amendments fails on every proposition as against this bill—every member. There is a compact unity here to carry this bill without amendment.

A MEMBER. What are you going to do about it?

Mr. COX. What am I going to do about it? That is just what I am coming to.

Mr. ATHERTON. Show it up before the country.

Mr. COX. What am I going to do about it! I will ask that question prayerfully next Sunday. I have endeavored to do my duty on this bill. I have endeavored to have such a fair and equitable amendment presented here as would commend itself to the country. I may have failed. I have failed. I have failed in getting the amendment in, possibly because I may have been too impulsive or forward in opposing the bill. I understand my responsibility.

My friend from West Virginia, [Mr. KENNA,] whom I love to aid in all proper ways, representing in part a State that was brought into existence during the war by a Cæsarean operation which I always opposed, could not understand how it was I opposed everything from his State. He intimated I had some bad motive or some other motive.

Mr. KENNA. Some other motive. [Laughter.]

Mr. COX. A good motive, then. It was a good motive. I stand on the "ancient ways," from which, I fear, gentlemen around me have departed. I cannot vote for these appropriations even for my own city and State when I know that every one of them tends to the corruption of our Government, at least in the last resort. My friend has come here year after year because he has been faithful to his constituents. How faithful—[holding up a large newspaper volume]—I wish you would send the Sergeant-at-Arms here—[laughter]—how faithful will be seen if the Clerk will only read the extract which I have marked in the volume sent to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

KENNA, of West Virginia, is one of the members of the House Committee on Commerce, and in that capacity helps to prepare the river and harbor bill. He holds his seat apparently by the indulgence of his constituents in consequence of his activity as a "grabber;" and after the adjournment of each Congress returns to his district with a great flourish of trumpets on his river and harbor record alone. The Kanawha Gazette welcomed him home after his great exploits in very cordial terms, and gave him credit for securing the following appropriations:

| For Guyandotte River | $2,000 |
| For Elk River | 5,000 |
| For New River | 12,000 |
| For Big Sandy River | 55,000 |
| For Kanawha River | 200,000 |
| For Charleston custom-house | 75,000 |

The Gazette commented on these appropriations as follows:

"Kanawha River receives as much as the harbor of the city of New York! Charleston as much as the city of Philadelphia for its harbor."

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. KENNA obtained the floor, and said: I wish to yield a few minutes of my five, that the gentleman from New York may have the continuation of that article read. It is very interesting matter.

Mr. COX. I wish to disavow one word in the article. I did not know the word "grabber" was there when I sent it up. I withdraw that word.

The Clerk continued the reading, as follows:

The third district receives more this year from the public Treasury than the net amount of all the taxes that have gone into the Treasury from the whole State of West Virginia for five years. Every dollar of it is now in the Treasury ready to be paid out as soon as it is called for. Since HEREFORD and KENNA have been our representatives the golden stream has poured steadily into our midst, refreshing the hearts and bearing blessings into the hands of our laboring-men, their wives and children.

Some of the results of democratic economy and southern supremacy may be seen in the river and harbor bill as applied to the great State of West Virginia. It has a solid democratic delegation at Washington.

Mr. COX. That is taken from a Chicago paper, the Tribune.

Mr. KENNA. I might appropriately ask the gentleman from New York if he does not wish somebody would write in that way about him? In so far as what is stated in that article involves a faithful performance on my part of my duties on this floor, not only to my own district and State but to every public interest of this entire country, it does no more than justice; and that is the only comment I have to make on it.

Mr. ATHERTON. I move to strike out the last word, and yield my time to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX.]

Mr. COX. I have nothing to say but commendation to my friend from West Virginia as to his regard for local interests. I never yielded to these shrieks of locality. But if some one does not stand up as I do, these bills will go through, accumulating each year by millions, as they have been growing in the past. I say let us call a halt and go to the consideration of the appropriation bill.

The question being taken on the amendment offered by Mr. COX, there were—ayes 60, noes 65.

Mr. LOUNSBERY. A quorum has not voted. I think there should be a full vote on that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. A quorum not having voted, the Chair will order tellers; and appoints the gentleman from West Virginia, Mr. KENNA, and the gentleman from New York, Mr. LOUNSBERY.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 56, noes 93.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read the following:

Improving Shenandoah River, West Virginia, $2,500; but this sum shall not be expended, nor shall the sum heretofore appropriated therefor be expended, until any corporate rights or franchises that may exist over said river shall have been relinquished.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I move to strike out the paragraph just read. This is an improvement not yet begun. The act of June 14, 1880, appropriated $15,000, but the Secretary of War has not yet expended a dollar of that. This bill gives $2,500 more. It is clear from the Engineer's report that nothing can be done with so small a sum. The estimate for the improvement is $72,000. When done this improvement is designed, if successful, to make a channel twenty feet wide and eighteen inches deep.

There are proprietary rights in this river. A corporation chartered under the laws of West Virginia has control of a lot of old locks in this stream. It is navigated only by gondolas or flat-boats, which are floated down and broken up or sold. The stream is too steep to navigate boats up-stream. The engineer, in his letter dated January 5, 1880, says:

The up-stream business was small, the navigation being difficult on account of its steepness.

The object of this large appropriation seems to be to make the grade a little better, so that the water will run down hill, I suppose. The engineer has grave doubts of its propriety. He says:

By the act of the Legislature of West Virginia, dated February 27, 1872, a company was incorporated for the purpose of "improving the navigation of the Shenandoah River. * * * It is supposed that the rights of the old Shenandoah Navigation Company still exist over the part of the river in Virginia as granted by that State.

And then follows a remarkable statement, when we consider that it comes from a river and harbor engineer. He says:

The question arises as to the propriety of expenditure by the General Government of funds from the United States Treasury until the rights of the companies incorporated under State laws are formally surrendered.

Here are two navigation companies having exclusive rights in this river, and for whose benefit this appropriation of $2,500 and that of $15,000 in 1880 are made.

The question being taken on the motion to strike out the paragraph, it was not agreed to.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. I move to strike out the last word. I want to lay before the House a few sentences from the report of the engineer on this stream, without any extended remarks of my own. The engineer says:

A copy of the report is appended hereto. As therein stated the estimate contemplated—

"Contemplated," mind you—

the estimate contemplated an open river, down-stream navigation.

Mr. ORTH. That is easier than up-stream.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. As the engineer says:

The estimate contemplated an open river, down-stream navigation, with channels through the bars and ledges of a width of twenty feet and a depth of eight inches at low stages of water.

Then, in speaking of the character of the boats which navigate this stream, he says:

These gondolas were from forty to sixty-five feet in length and eight to ten feet in width.

In another place he says:

All these reports indicate the very considerable expense of an attempt to slack-water or highly improve the navigation of the Shenandoah River. Its present importance as a route for moving freight is not sufficient to justify the expenditure of a large sum upon it. This is particularly true since, in addition to the existing valley branch of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, the construction of the Shenandoah Valley Railroad seems an assured fact. In the future, somewhat distant, when the population of this magnificent and productive valley becomes as dense as that of the European nations—as of France, for instance, where, notwithstanding the net-work of railways with which that fine State is covered, almost every river is made navigable if not so naturally, and many canals are in use and many more projected—the Shenandoah may be itself highly improved or become the water-supply of a canal along or near it.

Again, in speaking of this down-stream navigation, the engineer says:

The estimate, which is the result of Mr. Hutton's examination of the river, contemplates an open river, down-stream navigation, with channels through the bars and ledges of a width of twenty feet, &c.

In another place he says:

As is usual with mountain streams, the river flows alternately through pools of comparatively slack-water, and over the ledges and shoals, forming rapids and falls.

* * * * * * *

The depths over the ledges and shoals vary from four or five inches to eight or nine in their lowest places, as they generally, for considerable portions of their length, are above the plane of low water.

At page 675 he says:

The improvement, I am of opinion, should be of a capacity that would accommodate floats of thirty tons burden.

That is what the improvement should be; not what the condition of the stream is now.

One sufficient for floats much exceeding that burden would cost greatly more than the estimate given below.

And below I find the estimate to be "$2,000,000, exclusive of land damages."

Mr. ERRETT. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ERRETT. What is the pending amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. It is the motion of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. UPDEGRAFF] to strike out the last word of the pending paragraph.

Mr. ERRETT. The gentleman has not been discussing his amendment.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. PAGE. In order to make this paragraph complete, I suggest that there should be inserted after the word "relinquished" the words "to the United States, to the satisfaction of the Secretary of of War." That is the usual phrase employed, and I presume when the committee in this place speaks of relinquishing any corporate rights or franchises over this river they mean that they shall be relinquished to somebody and to the satisfaction of somebody. Therefore I move to amend by adding to the paragraph, "to the United States, to the satisfaction of the Secretary of War."

Mr. KENNA. I hope that by unanimous consent that amendment will be adopted.

The amendment of Mr. PAGE was agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read the following:

Improving river and harbor at Saint Joseph, Michigan, $3,000.

Mr. BURROWS. I move to amend the paragraph just read by inserting after the words "Saint Joseph" the words "and water channel leading up to Benton Harbor."

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio. There is no objection to that that I can see.

Mr. BURROWS. The committee will observe that my amendment does not increase the appropriation at all, but merely makes this paragraph conform to the corresponding paragraph of the river and harbor bill of last session.

Mr. REAGAN. I suppose there will be no objection to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following:

Improving the Ohio River, $350,000; of which sum $150,000 may, in the discretion of the engineers, be expended on Davis Island dam and $200,000 on the river from its mouth to its head: Provided, That $20,000 of the last-named sum may, in the discretion of the engineers, be expended on Indiana Chute.

Mr. NEW. I move to amend the proviso of the paragraph just read by striking out "$20,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$50,000." The amendment which I offer will not increase the sum total of the appropriation for the improvement of the Ohio River.

The paragraph under consideration proposes to appropriate $350,000 for the improvement of the Ohio River, $150,000 of which may be used on what is known as Davis Island dam, and the remaining $200,000 for the improvement of the river from its mouth to its source, $20,000 of the sum last named to be used, in the discretion of the engineers, upon what is known as the "Indiana Chute." My amendment is to increase the last-named sum from twenty to fifty thousand dollars, to be expended on the Indiana Chute at the discretion of the engineers.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. The gentleman does not propose to increase the sum total of the appropriation for the Ohio River.

Mr. NEW. I do not. I wish to say a word further in this connection. This chute is opposite Louisville, in or through what is known as the "falls" of the Ohio, near the Indiana shore. When there is water sufficient, and that is probably four months out of the twelve, boats pass through this chute.

The canal on the Louisville side and this chute on the Indiana side are the ways or routes over or upon which boats pass at this point on the Ohio River. The commercial importance of this chute and the necessity for its improvement will be seen when I state that much of the time the canal cannot be used. For example, in the past year, for seventeen days the canal was not used on account of repairs necessary to be made during that time, and for fifty-seven days it was not used on account of high water. Sometimes, too, the canal is frozen over, when the chute itself, as well as the river, both above and below, is open. The improvement of this chute will very greatly promote the navigation and commerce of the Ohio River. A thorough improvement of this important chute or channel will require, as shown by the estimates of the engineers, a much larger sum than $50,000, but I only ask that $50,000 be appropriated now, trusting to the futurefor further necessary appropriations. I hope the amendment I have offered will be adopted.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I heartily concur in supporting the amendment submitted by my honorable friend from Indiana, [Mr. NEW.] I know the importance of improving the chute to which he refers. The amendment does not increase at all the amount of the appropriation, but simply gives the Engineer Department discretion to use a certain part of the appropriation upon this chute. I hope the Committee on Commerce will not object to the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio. It will be observed that by the terms of this appropriation the Engineer Department already has discretion as to the expenditure of this money. The paragraph in question provides that if the engineers see proper $20,000 may be expended on the Indiana Chute; but there is no reason why they may not expend $50,000 or $100,000 at that place if they desire to do so. I think it best to leave this matter to be regulated in the wise discretion of the engineer who has charge of all the work on the Ohio, and who will no doubt spend the money where it is most needed.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I would like to call the attention of my friend to one consideration. The clause authorizing the engineer in his discretion to expend $20,000 for this particular purpose would, according to the rules of legal construction, prohibit him from using in any event a larger sum for that purpose. I think there is no doubt about that.

Mr. PRICE. He has a discretion up to $20,000, but cannot go beyond that.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. It is very clear that such would be the legal construction; hence it is the object of the amendment to enlarge that discretion.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the amendment. In doing so I do not doubt the representations made by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. NEW] or the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BUTTERWORTH.] They may be correct; but I do deny that this House can at any time safely direct the engineers in the expenditure of this money. There are other points on the Ohio River that need improvement. If we undertake now to direct the expenditure of this money, I can suggest a point on the Ohio River for which I have not asked from this committee one dollar of appropriation, relying upon the discretion and judgment of the engineers to appropriate that money.

Mr. NEW. Will the gentleman allow me a single suggestion? After my amendment shall have been adopted it will still be as now within the discretion of the engineer as to whether one cent shall be applied to the improvement of the Indiana Chute. I believe myself, however, that every dollar of the fifty thousand, and more than double that sum, ought to be expended on that part of the Ohio River.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Very true, Mr. Chairman; but I am opposed to giving even indirectly a direction to the engineers, upon the mere suggestion of one member on this floor, as to where any portion of this $200,000 shall be expended. Let this money be spent along that river from its mouth according to the discretion of the engineers. For instance, I propose to represent to them that at the mouth of the Beaver $1,500 or $2,000 can be safely and judiciously appropriated for an ice-breaker to protect the navigation which winters at that point from break-ups such as that which has just occurred, tearing away with it, perhaps, barge after barge. I say, let the expenditure be in the discretion of the engineers. Let us not use up this $200,000 by directing that $50,000 shall be spent at one point, $75,000 at another, $125,000 at another, and so on. We cannot safely do that when considering this bill on this floor under the five-minute rule. For these reasons I trust that the amendment will not prevail.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say to my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. SHALLENBERGER] that he is mistaken in his statement that no estimate has been made for the improvement of this Indiana Chute. He will find upon examination of the Chief Engineer's report that General Weitzel, who has immediate supervision of the subject, estimates that $110,000 are needed to complete this improvement. Instead of $50,000, as asked for in the pending amendment, I would be glad to see this committee appropriate the whole amount. Why should this not be done? Do gentlemen understand that this chute is the main channel of the Ohio River? Do they know that frequently for one-third of the year it is the only natural connecting link in the great chain of commerce between the cities of New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and other places east of the Alleghany, and the cities of Pittsburgh, Wheeling, Cincinnati, Louisville, Saint Louis, and numerous other important points west and northwest of the Appalachian range?

The immense tonnage which passes in this direction demands recognition at the hands of the Federal Government. Over a million and a half tons of freight pass annually through the canal and through this chute. What other appropriation in this bill can present stronger facts in its support? I do not, sir, wish to make invidious comparisons. I do not stand here to criticise the amounts appropriated in this bill to other localities. Not having the same opportunities for information which the Committee on Commerce has had, I am willing, as to the great majority of its acts, to yield to their judgment. There are, however, one or two instances where it seems to me the appropriations are utterly inadequate. The most striking case of this kind is the Ohio River. Need I say anything in this presence to magnify the importance of that river? The internal commerce of the Ohio to-day is greater than the whole external commerce of this country. We yearly give millions of dollars in the way of appropriations for harbors, light-houses, &c., for external commerce. What is given in this bill to the Ohio River? The whole amount is $350,000; and of that sum $150,000 is given to Davis Island Dam, leaving only the sum of $200,000 for the whole river from its head to its mouth. Such a sum is utterly out of proportion when we consider the immense commerce of the Ohio. We ought to have five times that amount. We ought to have, and I hope in the near future we will have, a sufficient amount to give us a continuous depth from Pittsburgh to Cairo of from five to six feet; and I declare here that as long as I am on this floor I shall continue to agitate and to present this subject until that result is attained.

The Representatives of the people owe it to the great and increasing commerce of the Ohio Valley to extend a just recognition to its demands. Every creek and every harbor in the country has its friend and representative before the Committee on Commerce and upon the floor of this House; but the Ohio, although conveying the commerce of fourteen great States of this Union, has been in great part ignored or neglected. It seems to have been thought large enough to take care of itself. The time has come for a change in this state of things. The cry for cheap transportation is coming up from every direction, and is coming in such a way as to compel attention. No more important question will come before the National Legislature in the future than the development, the improvement of our great waterways; and as a step in that direction I am glad to see that in this bill a million and a half of dollars is appropriated to the Mississippi. I hope and believe that an equally liberal policy will be observed as to the Ohio.

Mr. NEW's amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I move to amend the clause by adding the following:

And $20,000 to be expended in opening the channel between Hurricane Island and the Illinois shore, near Elizabethtown.

This amendment does not increase the appropriation a single dollar. The object of the amendment is to save the existence of a town of considerable importance on the Ohio River. It is the county-seat of Harden County, and is in the midst of a very valuable and prosperous mining as well as agricultural region. I will send to the Clerk's desk to be read a petition from that town, setting forth the present condition of the channel opposite the town; and I wish to call the attention of the House particularly to this statement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Your petitioners most respectfully represent that the navigation of the Ohio River at and near the head of Hurricane Island, in said river, is rendered incommodious and perilous for the following reasons, to wit: The main current of said river used to flow upon the north side and to the right of Hurricane Island, and the channel was broad and deep, and navigation easy and safe; and the river continued so to flow till about —— years ago, when, owing to alluvion about one mile above the head of the island, the current began to deflect to the left, and gradually formed a channel upon the south side of the island, though a very narrow one, and filled with snags and obstructions that render navigation perilous, to the great injury of commerce and the carrying trade in said river. That at the breaking up of the ice in the winter of 1878 and 1879 the current of the river commencing at the head of Hurricane Island set in toward the south with greater force, and is now cutting off the soil on the left bank of the river and on the Kentucky shore at a rapid rate, to the great and permanent injury of the farmers upon that side of the river, whose farm lands are justly esteemed highly productive and valuable, but which will in the course of a few years be almost, if not quite, destroyed. Your petitioners further represent that the town of Elizabethtown is situated on the right bank of the Ohio River, near the foot of Hurricane Island, and that said town is the principal trading and shipping point for a large section of country lying to the north, east, and west of said town; that since the changing of the current of the river as above set forth, the bar projecting from the foot of the island has been gradually extending down the river toward Jack's Point, and will soon project far enough down the river to cut off the harbor at Elizabethtown to such an extent that steamers cannot land at said town; that the channel of the river on the north side of Hurricane Island is still broad and deep below the obstruction near the head of the island, and if said obstruction was removed, which could probably be done by a little dredging, the current would naturally flow on the north side of the island; but, owing to the obstructions above, will eventually fill up, and the channel will thereby be destroyed, to the great detriment of the inhabitants on the Illinois shore and the people of Elizabethtown.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. This is of the same nature as the amendment already adopted at the instance of the gentleman from Indiana at the Indiana Chute opposite Louisville, and does not increase the appropriation one dollar, but will prevent the town being isolated from the river which is the only connection it has with the outer world, it having no railroad connection.

Mr. OSCAR TURNER. Would it not interfere with the landings on the Kentucky side?

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Not a particle. The other channel will be left open and free by this amendment. It provides for dredging at the head of the island to enable the channel to run as heretofore on both sides the island.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is not agreed to.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I shall ask for a division on this amendment. It is precisely like the one adopted at the instance of the gentleman from Indiana. If that was right, then this, of course, is right.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 29, noes 66.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WARNER. I move to insert the following:

And a like sum on the ice-harbor at the mouth of the Muskingum.

This does not change the appropriation at all, nor does it change the discretion of the engineer, but emphasizes that discretion, as it may become necessary in the continuance of that work he shall have such discretion. That is all I ask in this amendment, and I do not think there can be any objection to it.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 17, noes 47.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. In line 241, after the word "chute," I move to insert the following:

Provided, That $2,500 may be expended at or near the mouth of Beaver River for the construction of ice-breakers, in the discretion of the engineers.

One word on that amendment. I think the engineers probably exercising their discretion would provide these ice-breakers now, but I desire to have it incorporated in this section so there may be no question as to the intent and willingness of Congress to permit it. During the recent break-up vessels were very much imperiled at the mouth of Beaver River, which forms a very good harbor for vessels coming up the Ohio River during the winter season. The Committee on Commerce could not have had it brought to their attention because of the lateness of the season. The chamber of commerce at Pittsburgh has very recently passed resolutions, which have been referred to the Committee on Commerce, calling attention to the very great necessity of several ice-breakers there in order to protect such vessels as come up the Ohio River and are detained by the accumulation of ice at this point.

At this point on the Ohio River vessels are lost every spring by the break-up of the ice and they absolutely need this appropriation for the protection of the navigation of this great river. It does not increase the appropriation, but simply allows in the discretion of the engineers an expenditure not to exceed $2,500 for that purpose. I trust if the House is willing to commit itself to anything like a direct appropriation of this kind it will not withhold this the only appropriation I have seen fit and proper to ask of the House or the committee on the pending bill.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 27, noes 66.

So the amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. THOMAS. I move to strike out in line 236 the word "fifty," and add at the end of the paragraph the following:

And $50,000 shall be expended to continue the work at Grand Chain Rapids.

Now, Mr. Chairman, for the 1,000 miles of the navigable waters of the Ohio River $350,000 has been set apart by this bill for its improvement. One hundred and fifty thousand dollars of that sum has been placed in the hands of the engineers to continue the public works within the first five miles from the head of the river; $150,000 for Davis Island Dam, within five miles of the head of the river, and $200,000 for nine hundred and ninety-five miles—the balance of the river. It is urged here that Davis Island Dam is an important work, that large sums of money have been expended upon it, that it should be completed, and that it is of great importance to the commerce of the country. Five miles of navigable river is indeed important; but nine hundred and ninety-five miles is much more important. There have been appropriations for the last three years for the improvement of the work on Grand Chain Rapids. The commerce which floats over the Ohio River and passes Davis Island Dam passes over these rapids within twenty-three miles of the mouth of the river. The commerce of the Ohio River has been estimated by the best authority for the year 1879 at $694,000,000. That does not include the 1,200 miles of the navigable waters of the Tennessee River, over which Grand Chain Rapids all that commerce must pass. It does not include the eight hundred miles of the navigable waters of the Cumberland River, over which rapids all its commerce must pass. It does not include all the miles of navigable waters of the Wabash, over which rapids its commerce must pass. Nor does it include the Kentucky River, the Green River, and all the large tributaries to the Ohio River. These rapids are, as I have said, within twenty-three miles of the mouth of the river. The contracts have been let for the building of dikes there to improve the current.

This is a dangerous rapid now, and dikes have been begun to confine the waters within one channel whereby the navigation of the river may be rendered entirely safe. Contracts have been already awarded for the construction of these dikes to the amount of $87,117.70, and now I ask that inasmuch as this amendment does not increase the aggregate amount of the appropriation for the improvement of the Ohio River that $50,000 be allowed—in other words, that common justice may be done to the nine hundred and ninety-five miles of the balance of the river when you propose here to give $100,000 for the improvement of the first five miles of it. I am sure, Mr. Chairman, that there can be no valid objection urged against this amendment. It ought to be adopted, and I hope it will commend itself to the committee.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Chairman, the point indicated is upon the Mississippi River, and it is already contemplated by the committee to place some six hundred thousand dollars under the control of the engineers diverted for its improvement. We thought it best that the engineers should have the power to use this money——

Mr. OSCAR TURNER. The gentleman from Texas is referring to the Mississippi River. The amendment has reference to the Ohio.

Mr. REAGAN. I beg pardon; I should have referred to the appropriation for the Ohio River. I desire to state that we have already agreed to divert a portion of this appropriation of $350,000 for the use of this river, and the amount of $150,000 to be used under the discretion of the engineers at the Davis Island Dam; and also the sum of $50,000, of which sum $20,000 may be used in the discretion of the engineers on this Indiana Chute. This diverts, as I have stated, $200,000 for these improvements, and as I understand that there will be another amendment proposed, I think it is better that the committee should consider well before diverting any more of this money for local appropriations, remembering that it will take away the appropriations for the great river upon which floats so much of the commerce of this country.

Mr. THOMAS. I would like to ask the distinguished gentleman from Texas a question. Did I understand him to say that the sum of $600,000 was contemplated to be set apart in this bill for this improvement?

Mr. REAGAN. I did say so; but had reference to the Mississippi River. I immediately corrected it, however, and stated $350,000 was allowed. Already $200,000 of that has been diverted to local improvements, and this proposition is to divert $50,000 more to local work, leaving only $100,000 of the total sum for the improvement of the river from its head to its mouth. The committee think that it might leave $150,000 of this sum to be expended under the discretion of the engineers. We believe that it may safely be left to their discretion, and if necessary they will apply it to such local improvements or work as the exigencies of the case may demand. They are upon the ground understanding the conditions, and are in a better condition to decide upon the question than we at this point. I insist that this sum shall not be set apart specifically for this improvement, but shall be left to the judgment of the engineers in charge, who have the power under the terms of this bill to do the work if it be necessary.

Mr. THOMAS. A single word, Mr. Chairman, in response to the remarks of the gentleman from Texas. The engineer in charge of this work even went so far in his report as to recommend that the appropriation for the improvement of the Ohio River should make no specific direction as to how or where the money should be expended. He even went so far—subject to the local influence by which he was surrounded—as to suggest or recommend that the bill be entitled "A bill for the improvement of the Ohio River, and the Davis Island Dam," so that they might be entitled to appropriate or use the whole $350,000 if necessary to the improvement of that one point to the exclusion of all the balance of the river. Now, Mr. Chairman, engineers are subject to influences by which they are surrounded just as much as other men are. And they are no more capable or better qualified to give opinions as to the needs of the commerce and commercial wants of the country, or to say how this money should be expended, than other people. Their work and education enable them to decide upon the practicability or impracticability of certain improvements, but does not necessarily carry them beyond that point. Therefore, I say for the purpose of giving the lower nine hundred and ninety-five miles of the Ohio River a fair show, that Congress shall at least give its consent that a part of the appropriation made in this bill may be expended where it will benefit all the commerce of the river, and not confine it to a local point.

Mr. REAGAN. I will state, Mr. Chairman, that the engineer did make the recommendation to which the gentleman refers, but the committee did not think proper to incorporate it in this bill.

Mr. OSCAR TURNER. Is an amendment now in order?

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. OSCAR TURNER. Then I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, the "Grand Chain" is a ledge of rocks lying some fifteen or twenty miles above the mouth of the Ohio, in the river. It obstructs the navigation of the river which carries all the river commerce from the States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Kentucky, and from the State of Pennsylvania, and also all the river commerce of the Tennessee and Cumberland Rivers, and prevents its connection with the Mississippi River. It cuts off navigation between Paducah, a flourishing and growing city in my district, and the Mississippi River at Cairo, except for small boats, for several months in the year. The water is reduced to thirty inches on this barrier, and can only be passed over by boats of very light draught. We have had so far not one dollar appropriated in this bill to remove that barrier, or the bars between Paducah and the mouth of the Ohio, or between Carrsville and Paducah.

I desire to invite the attention of the committee to some of the facts. The point was made here that these appropriations ought to bear some similitude with the amount of internal revenue which is paid by the States in which the improvements are made. I contend for no such proposition; but I think it ought to have great weight. Look for a moment at the facts I will briefly allude to.

In 1878 the State of Kentucky paid over six million dollars of internal revenue alone into the Treasury. The district, part of which I have the honor to represent, paid over one million dollars into the Treasury that year. I will state now the amount paid into the Federal Treasury by the States along the Ohio River since 1863. Illinois has paid $223,000,000, Kentucky has paid $101,000,000, Indiana has paid $72,000,000, and the great State of Ohio has paid $246,000,000 of internal revenue since 1863. And yet, sir, that barrier is permitted to remain there, destroying and locking up the river commerce of those great States. Mr. Chairman, it would not have been permitted to remain twelve months in front of a northern harbor. If it had been in front of an ocean harbor, or of a harbor upon one of the northern lakes, an appropriation would have been made to blow it out, even if it had cost a million of dollars. And yet, with these States paying this immense amount of revenue into the Treasury, we cannot get a dollar from the Committee on Commerce to improve the navigation and remove this barrier, which locks up all the commerce of the States lying on the Ohio, the Tennessee, and the Cumberland Rivers, all of them great national highways. And yet, sir, millions of dollars are given by this bill, as has been shown during this debate, to small, insignificant rivers and local creeks, which will be of no benefit unless it be the spending of the amounts appropriated in those localities, while the great national rivers have not received any adequate appropriation—only $350,000 to the Ohio River and $150,000 of that to be expended on a dam near Pittsburgh, leaving the small balance to be scattered along over eight hundred miles of bars and obstructions without any system.

It has been said I was opposed to all appropriations in river and harbor bills. I am not. I am in favor of improving the navigation of all the great rivers which are national in their character and which are really navigable, and by which commerce may be benefited; but I am opposed to voting away the public money to many of those streams which have been described by the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. UPDEGRAFF.]

I will support the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. THOMAS.] I would be willing to vote for double that amount. And at the proper time I will offer an amendment, that this matter be put under the direction of the engineers and that they be permitted to adopt such a plan as will remove this barrier, so that we can have permanent navigation for large boats from the mouth of the Tennessee to the Mississippi. And to that amendment I invite the support of every member who is interested in the commerce of the Ohio, the Tennessee, and the Cumberland.

Mr. Chairman, I discussed this question at the last session of Congress, and my remarks are to be found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Forty-sixth Congress, second session, pages 478 and 479, in which I pointed out the proper plan, in my judgment, for the improvement of the Mississippi River and its navigable tributaries in a systematic and economical plan, that would result in some benefit to the commerce of the West; and as I have not the time in the few minutes allowed under the rules of this debate, I refer the committee to those remarks, which under the privilege granted, I will append to these remarks. They were as follows:

Mr. Chairman, I did not desire to trespass on the time of the committee upon this question; but inasmuch as a part of the time that was allotted to the Committee on Levees and Improvement of the Mississippi River was taken up by gentlemen on the other side I have concluded to offer a few remarks explanatory of the motives of our committee in offering the amendment proposed by Mr. ROBINSON. And I will take occasion right here to say that there was no intention on the part of any member of the Committee on Levee Improvements to cast any reflections upon the Committee on Commerce, much less upon my distinguished friend the chairman of that committee, General REAGAN, of Texas. We all entertain for him the highest regard as a legislator—I know that I do personally—and would not reflect upon him in any way. But, sir, the question that we wanted to present to the Committee of the Whole was this: that the improvement of the navigation of the Mississippi River and of its tributaries was a question so momentous and involving so much labor that the Committee on Commerce had not the necessary time to devote to that specific subject. We thought that the House ought to act in accordance and in analogy with the precedent that has been set heretofore in regard to the Committee on Pacific Railroads. It is well known that we have the Committee on Railways and Canals, which has a general jurisdiction coextensive with the Union; but notwithstanding that when these railroads to the Pacific were projected a new Committee on the Pacific Railroad was formed in this House on account of the magnitude of the work and the labor which would be required in investigations of a proper character.

Mr. Chairman, appropriations have been made for many years without any general plan by which the navigation of the Mississippi and its navigable tributaries were permanently improved; appropriations have been made for this point and that, as the popularity of a member might secure them, under a log-rolling system, in harbor and river improvement bills, passed under a suspension of the rules without debate, in many instances appropriating public money to unimportant streams which I have not the time to refer to in my limited time. I refer to the defects in this system of improvements on the tributaries of the Mississippi as it has been carried on for many years, because it comes within my own knowledge and sad experience to know something about the matter, and because the people whom I have the honor to represent on this floor have felt the want of a proper and judicious plan of improvement of the Ohio River.

The amount of money which has been appropriated to the improvement of this river, which is the natural outlet of the larger portion of the agricultural products of Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, and Kentucky, might as well have been thrown into it, with but few exceptions. Small amounts have been appropriated to improve such particular points as could be secured by the influence of Representatives, with no view to any general or judicious system, but more to drop a few thousand dollars at a particular locality than to accomplish any general good.

Mr. Chairman, I will give you an illustration of what I mean. In the district which I represent is the city of Paducah, at the mouth of the Tennessee River, the emporium of Southern Kentucky and a part of West Tennessee, one of the best manufacturing points west of the Alleghany Mountains, with an inexhaustible amount of iron, coal, and timber just above on the Ohio, Cumberland, and Tennessee Rivers, all of which could be utilized and made to add to the general wealth and prosperity of the country; and besides this Paducah is surrounded by the finest tobacco-growing country in the United States, and is the second largest tobacco market west of the mountains, and yet we have been forced, poor as we are, to build railroads at our own expense, with no subsidies from the Federal Government, and at an immense and ruinous cost to our people, to remove the products of honest labor and to give us intercourse with other points on the rivers.

And why is this? Nature has given us the Ohio as a great highway, the Tennessee and Cumberland empty into the Ohio at our very doors, and we are only fifty miles from the mighty Mississippi; and yet, Mr. Chairman, we are debarred of these great natural commercial advantages because there is a ledge of rocks in the river called the Grand Chain, and one bar just above the mouth of the river, locking in not only our commerce, but the whole commerce of the States lying on the Ohio, Cumberland, and Tennessee by reducing the water at these points to thirty inches in the summer months, and forcing us to resort to railroads, with their high and extravagant rates of carriage, which swallow up the profits of the farmers and the artisans of our country. These barriers would not block a single harbor in the Northern States twelve months. The money would have been appropriated to remove them as soon as it was suggested, as the appropriation annually of millions to northern harbors shows.

Mr. Chairman, allow me to say something here in reply to an observation which was made by my distinguished friend from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN,] who said that there had been a spirit of liberality exhibited toward the Mississippi River and its tributaries by the Committee on Commerce. I desire to invite the attention of this House for a few moments to that matter. Since those improvements commenced we have had appropriated for that purpose only $7,000,000, while over two hundred million dollars have been appropriated for the improvement of northern harbors and unimportant rivers. Now let us look at the equity and justice of this thing. In 1878 the State of Kentucky paid over six million dollars into the Treasury, as shown by the report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, which I have here. The district, part of which I have the honor to represent, paid about one million dollars into the Treasury in that year.

I will refer to the amount paid into the Federal Treasury by States along the Ohio River since 1863. Illinois has paid $233,673,726.50, Kentucky has paid $101,012,299.47, Indiana $72,664,558.61, and the great State of Ohio $246,397,075.46 of internal revenue since 1863. As I have said, Kentucky in the last twelve months reported by the Commissioner has paid $6,880,614.15 into the Federal Treasury, which is more than double the amount paid by all the New England States in the same length of time.

Now, what have we had in return? It is true that we have not been urgent in our claims before Congress; but when gentlemen talk about the equity and justice that have been meted out to us I must say that I cannot see it. I do not contend that we ought to have improvements in proportion to the revenue which we pay; but it does seem to me that these facts ought to enter into the consideration of the question when we ask for an appropriation.

I shall vote to give entire jurisdiction over the subject of the improvement of the Mississippi River and its navigable tributaries to the Committee on Levees and Improvements of the Mississippi River, but have no objection to the supervision of the report by the Committee on Appropriations, to regulate the amount annually; for I am opposed to any extravagant or useless appropriations for this or any other purpose, and only advocate giving the jurisdiction to this committee because I believe it will utilize such appropriations as are annually made, and will be in the interest of retrenchment and reform.

The question being taken on the amendment offered by Mr. THOMAS, there were—ayes 32, noes 51.

So (further count not being called for) the amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read the following:

Improving harbor at Wilmington, California, $12,000.

Mr. PACHECO. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

Strike out "$12,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$33,000."

Mr. PACHECO. Mr. Chairman, the House is in receipt of a memorial to Congress from the citizens of Los Angeles, embraced within the district which I have the honor to represent here, praying for a further appropriation for the harbor improvements at Wilmington, begun there some time since. In view of the rapid increase in the population of that portion of the State, the existence of the Southern Pacific Railroad which intersects it, the fact that it is the great commercial outlet of Southern California and Arizona, it is of the utmost importance that a further appropriation should be made for the completion of the harbor improvements already under way.

The California coast from San Francisco to San Diego—a distance of five hundred miles—is unprovided with a single port of refuge for shipping in storms.

The United States Government, fully appreciating the necessity for creating a port of refuge, carefully surveyed the harbor of Wilmington, and has appropriated the sum of half a million dollars toward its improvement. With this money a breakwater 6,700 feet long has been constructed—the outer 2,000 feet of it, however, only to the level of low tide. The sum thus far appropriated and expended has proved entirely insufficient for the completion of the work in accordance with the plan of the Government engineers. Therefore, in order that the work already begun shall not be damaged by being exposed to storms in its present unfinished condition, and that the purpose for which it was begun shall be accomplished, the people of that section respectfully ask and pray for a further appropriation. After a careful consideration of the subject, the Government engineers in charge of the work have given it as their opinion that the sum of $33,000 can be advantageously expended upon it in the course of the present year. In conclusion I would state that from my own personal knowledge of the great wealth and importance of Southern California, its rapidly increasing commerce, and the importance of having at that point a secure harbor for shipping, I believe that the appropriation asked for should be granted, and am satisfied that it would serve greatly to promote the best interests of that part of the country.

The question being taken on Mr. PACHECO's amendment, there were—ayes 60, noes 61.

Mr. PACHECO. No quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. A quorum not having voted, the Chair will order tellers, and appoints the gentleman from California, Mr. PACHECO, and the gentleman from West Virginia, Mr. KENNA.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 74, noes 78.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. BERRY. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "dollars," in line 271, insert "improving Humboldt Bay, California, $50,000."

Mr. BERRY. Mr. Chairman, there is no appropriation in this bill for Humboldt Bay. I presume the reason why there is not was because the report of the engineer was late in getting before the Committee on Commerce. In fact it was there, I believe, in their hands but a few days before they closed their labors on this bill. But, sir, at the last session of Congress an order was made directing the War Department to have that important bay surveyed. In obedience to that order it was surveyed, and the engineer reported that improvements were needed there, and recommended the appropriation of $50,000 to be expended this year.

I wish to state here that that is the most important harbor on the Pacific coast north of the bay of San Francisco. The commerce of that bay amounts to more than $1,000,000 annually. There arrive and depart from that bay not less than three hundred vessels. There is a growing country around it.

In view of the fact that the commerce of our coast is growing, I think it is time that the people of the United States should recognize the importance of that growing commerce and the needed improvements which it demands should be made.

The channels inside of the bay, according to the reports of the engineer, need dredging at the city of Eureka. It is in that section of country that the famous redwood forests of that coast exist. It is from there we draw the supplies of the fine redwood lumber that is used in the construction of improvements upon that coast. Much of that lumber finds its way to Europe and other parts of the world.

For these reasons I claim that this harbor should not be overlooked. And I ask, in view of the fact that the Committee on Commerce had not an opportunity to fully investigate the report of the engineer and ascertain the necessities of the commerce at that point upon our coast, that the House will adopt this amendment and let it become a part of this appropriation bill.

I do not feel disposed to antagonize this bill. I wish to say here I am one of those who would like to see a legitimate expenditure of $25,000,000 for our internal improvements. I am not in favor of spending the money upon those small streams that are of no commercial importance. But, sir, upon our great rivers and our harbors I would like to see an expenditure of $25,000,000. In view of the fact that the transportation of our country is passing into the hands of corporate influence, I believe that is the only means we have left to protect the people from their extortions.

The amendment moved by Mr. BERRY was not agreed to.

Mr. BELFORD. I move to insert after the paragraph last read that which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Sinking three artesian wells, one in the State of Colorado, one in the Territory of Utah, and one in the Territory of Wyoming, $30,000, said sum to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. REAGAN. I make a point of order on that amendment.

Mr. BELFORD. I hope the gentleman will withhold his point of order until I can be heard for five minutes on my amendment.

Mr. REAGAN. I will reserve the point of order.

Mr. BELFORD. Mr. Chairman, I feel a deep interest in everything that appertains to the promotion of our commercial relations. Commerce is a great civilizer, and its growth is a matter of universal concern. We are exceedingly proud of our rapid increase in population and of our augmentation of national wealth. A great writer has defined progress to be "such an improvement as can be verified by statistics, just as education is such knowledge as can be tested by examinations." Our census reports show that we have progressed in an amazing degree. The eastern portion of the country is duly sensible of this progress, and judging from the present bill proposes to avail itself of the surplus funds in the National Treasury. The disinterested members of the Committee on Commerce, acting on the scriptural ideas that a man who does not look after his own household is worse than an infidel, have feathered their own nests, and have treated with a very scant courtesy that portion of the United States lying west of the Mississippi River. Colorado, Nevada, Wyoming, Dakota, Arizona, and other Western States and Territories do not even receive the cold respect of a passing glance, and yet they have more trout streams than Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and West Virginia, that receive millions under this bill.

Commerce consists in the exchange of products, and the amendment I offer looks to the increase of products in that vast section of country lying west of the one hundredth meridian. In the State of Colorado, according to the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office for 1879, there are 66,880,000 acres of land that can only be utilized by irrigation. In Wyoming, subject to the same condition, are 62,645,120 acres, and in Utah, 54,064,640. This land in the main belongs to the National Government. It is dry and arid, and can only be reclaimed by water. I ask that you make an appropriation to reclaim this land, to the end that the commercial interests of the nation be advanced. Reclaim this land, and a dense population will occupy it. This population will cultivate the soil and produce unnumbered articles that will enter into the commerce of the country. We have received but little aid from the General Government. Under the act of Congress of June, 1879, the sum of $300,000 was appropriated for the survey of these lands. Of this sum Colorado received $23,400; Wyoming received $12,000; Utah received $10,000. This sum constitutes the extent of your appropriations for that region; and what have you received in return? Colorado last year paid into the Treasury $168,259.54; Wyoming paid in $15,947.95; Utah paid in $74,352.48.

Since Colorado became a State she has paid into the national Treasury $1,610,611.64, and I cannot recall but one appropriation made for her benefit except $20,000 last year, and that was made to reclaim the public lands in that State.

Now, Mr. Chairman, one word in conclusion. For years the West has contented itself with voting appropriations to improve eastern rivers and harbors. It is right that judicious appropriations for such purposes should be made. But are we of the far West forever to be deprived of our share of national aid? While you are enlarging commercial facilities in the East, will you shut your eyes against that vast domain lying west of the one hundredth meridian? One of the great and growing dangers to the Republic is founded in the overcrowded population of our great cities. One of the problems of this age is to bring the empty hands and unoccupied lands together. Before these lands can be utilized they must be reclaimed and made fit for human habitation. This can be done by procuring a needed supply of water, and this can only be reached through the agency of artesian wells. If it is right to appropriate millions to improve eastern rivers in order that commerce may be promoted, it cannot be wrong to appropriate a few thousand dollars to rescue from aridity a vast domain capable of accommodating millions of people, capable of becoming the center of a constantly expanding civilization, capable of being converted into happy homes for the toiling millions who are to come after. "Water is the Wahan of creation," says the Buddhist, and this remark has been indorsed in his Winter Sunbeams by the distinguished gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX.] In Spain, that gentleman tells us, through the agencies of artesian wells and irrigation, the desert is made to blossom like a garden. Under their influence peppers and peaches, apricots and apples, olives and oranges, sugar and citron, cotton and corn, potatoes and pears have sprung into existence to gladden the hearts of the people.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. I wish to say in this connection that no Representative or Delegate from the State or the Territories to which reference has been made by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELFORD] has asked for a single dollar in this bill, and not an estimate for that purpose has been laid before the committee.

I wish to call the attention of the committee briefly to a statement which I made hastily this morning, showing how the appropriations contained in this bill are distributed. For the Atlantic and Pacific coast, $3,000,000; for canals, $500,000; on the great lakes, $1,200,000; for surveys, $100,000; on the Mississippi River, $2,450,000; on the Missouri River, $350,000; on the Ohio River, $350,000; on the Tennessee River, $250,000; on the Illinois River, $250,000; on the Upper Mississippi, $150,000; on the Columbia River, $100,000; and on all the other rivers in the country and other works of improvement, $1,500,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not think that the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Colorado is germane to the subject-matter of this bill, and therefore sustains the point of order made against it by the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN.]

The Clerk read the following:

Improving Winnipiseogee Lake, New Hampshire: Completing improvement, $2,500.

Mr. HALL. I move to amend the paragraph just read by adding thereto that which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That no right to raise or lower the water level of said lake is hereby granted to any person or corporation.

Mr. HALL. By oversight, as I conceive, this provision was omitted in the preparation of this bill. I understand there is no objection to it on the part of the committee in charge of the bill, and I trust there will be no objection to it on the part of any gentleman.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. There is no objection to it.

Mr. REAGAN. I do not think there is any objection to it.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following:

Improving Mississippi, Missouri, and Arkansas Rivers: Removing snags, wrecks, and other obstructions, $150,000; of which sum $80,000 shall be expended on the Mississippi River, $45,000 on the Missouri River, and $25,000 on the Arkansas River.

Mr. RYAN, of Kansas. I move to amend the paragraph just read by striking out all after the words "and other obstructions" and inserting that which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Three hundred and fifty-five thousand dollars, to be expended as follows: $100,000 for building one iron-hulled snag-boat; $50,000 for repairing one wooden snag-boat and fitting it up for working purposes; for working expenses on Mississippi River, $90,000; for working expenses on Missouri River, $75,000; and for working expenses on the Arkansas River, $50,000.

Mr. RYAN, of Kansas, addressed the committee. [See Appendix.]

Mr. CLARDY. Mr. Chairman, I dislike to oppose the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas, because it looks to the improvement of the navigation of a river in which the people of the section from which I come are peculiarly interested. But, sir, the Committee on Commerce, after investigating this question with a degree of fairness commensurate as I believe with its importance, determined that the five boats already operating on the Missouri River are sufficient for the purpose of clearing that river of its snags; and hence the committee refused, as it did one year ago, to make an appropriation to increase the number of snag-boats. The committee, however, inserted in the bill a provision that $150,000 of the $200,000 asked for by the engineers should be used for continuing the operation of the snag-boats already at work, $45,000 of this sum being allotted to the Missouri River; and when it is considered that only about thirty-six thousand dollars was expended on that river during the last fiscal year, I take it that the Committee of the Whole will regard the amount named in the bill as entirely sufficient. One hundred and fifty thousand dollars, the amount recommended by the committee for these purposes, is a larger percentage than that recommended for the Upper Mississippi River, the sum demanded for carrying on the operations of snag-boats there being $40,000, and the recommendation of the committee $25,000.

The amendment of Mr. RYAN, of Kansas, was not agreed to, there being ayes 17, noes not counted.

Mr. KING. I move to amend by adding at the end of line 300, these words:

And this work shall be prosecuted during the low-water season; to wit, between the 1st day of July and the 1st day of December of each year.

The provision I now offer is in accordance with a resolution adopted at a convention held in New Orleans last December, representing persons interested in the navigation of the Mississippi River. The amendment provides simply that the work of removing snags and other obstructions from these great rivers shall be undertaken during the period of low water.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. I rise to oppose the amendment. As I understand, it proposes to require that this work be done at a low stage of water. I wish merely to read a line from the report of the engineers to show that it is impossible to get there unless the water is high. [Laughter.]

During the past winter:

This refers to the Arkansas River, one of the rivers embraced in this provision; and I do not wish to have it excluded:

During the past winter a snag-boat was dispatched to this field of operations to remove snags and other obstructions from such portion of the river as could be reached, but owing to the lateness of the season and the low water the boat could not get there.

Mr. KING. I ask to modify my amendment so as to apply to the Mississippi River only.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can modify his amendment in whatever way he chooses.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. I hope the gentleman will allow the amendment to stand as it is; it is now in proper form. I have had occasion to investigate very closely, and to become thoroughly informed in reference to the matter to which the gentleman's amendment applies. On the Mississippi River, from Cairo to New Orleans, in the season of high water, that is, from the 1st of December to the 1st of July, there is scarcely ever a snag seen unless it is a floating one. The snag-boats heretofore employed on the Mississippi, on the Arkansas, and on the Red River have prosecuted their work in the winter months. On the Arkansas River, for forty miles above its junction with the Mississippi River, and on the Mississippi from Cairo to New Orleans, at the beginning of the warm weather, or the sickly season, as it is known in the South, the snag-boats stop operations; they anchor at Cairo and remain until the winter months. It has been a subject of complaint among river men on all these rivers for more than twenty-five years that the snag-boats operated by the Government have not removed on an average one snag a month, for the very reason that at the season of the year when they are prosecuting this work there are no snags to be seen in any of these rivers.

The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. UPDEGRAFF] is mistaken if he supposes that snag-boats are not able to navigate the Arkansas River at almost any season of the year. It is very rare—and I appeal to gentlemen representing that district—it is very rare, I think, that steamboats do not run as high as Little Rock. Whenever an ordinary steamer can navigate that river snag-boats can operate. But under the present system, these boats are a fraud and a delusion. They are utterly useless; and not a dollar ought to be appropriated for this purpose unless the snag-boats are required to prosecute this work at a low state of water. Every gentleman in this House familiar with these rivers knows the truth of what I state. Unless this amendment or some similar provision be adopted, I hope the House will strike out the appropriation altogether.

Mr. MARSH. I rise to oppose the amendment of the gentleman from Louisiana, limiting the engineers in their work to the period from the 1st of July to the 1st of December.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. The gentleman will pardon me a moment; I was not quite through. I intended to move as a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Louisiana a proposition which will obviate the objection of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. MARSH,] an objection which had already occurred to me.

Mr. MARSH. In some years the Mississippi above Cairo is at a low stage of water in the month of March, and these snag-boats can at that time be at work.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. I desire to offer this as a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Louisiana.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield the floor?

Mr. MARSH. I do.

The Clerk read as follows:

And the work herein provided for shall be prosecuted at all seasons of the year, and especially between the 1st day of July and the 1st day of November each year.

Mr. KING. I have no objection to that as a modification of my amendment.

Mr. MARSH. There should be added, "subject to the discretion of the engineers."

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 49, noes 29.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MARSH. I move, in line 296, after the word "construction," to insert "$349,000," and I make that motion, although a similar one has been just voted down by the committee. I make it in view of the terrific deposits of snow made this winter along the upper watercourses of the Mississippi River. Everybody who is familiar with that stream is apprehensive, owing to these immense falls of snow, of an immense flood in that river during the coming season. If there shall be such a flood, the higher it may be and more prolonged it may be in that upper river, then the more snags will be washed into the channel, and the more labor and consequently the more money will be required to keep it clear. While, during the ordinary season of the year and under an ordinary rise of water, the present appropriation of $150,000 might be sufficient, yet the engineers have recommended that $350,000 ought to be appropriated. And, in view of the danger of an unusual overflow of that river during the coming spring, this Congress ought not to fail to make ample appropriation to keep the channel of that great water-way clear from obstructions which may be washed there by reason of the coming flood. And, sir, it is for that reason, in the face of the vote of the House given a few moments ago, that I offer this amendment, and I offer it in good faith.

And right here let me say that I hope the statements which have been printed in the public press during the last few days are not true, to the effect that there are a number of men in this House who have signed a paper agreeing there shall be no amendment, however meritorious, to this bill as it has been reported from the Committee on Commerce. If that be the determination of members of the House, to oppose amendments whether meritorious or not, I, as a man who has always been in favor of river and harbor appropriations, say to them they may have trouble in getting this bill through this House during this Congress.

Mr. HENDERSON. I think they have already had a good deal of trouble. [Laughter.]

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. As the gentleman has suggested that signatures to a paper have been obtained of gentlemen of this House agreeing to support this bill and to prevent any amendment being made to it——

Mr. MARSH. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. MARSH. I stated that that statement has been circulated in the public press all over the country.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. I deny the truth of any such statement and I defy the gentleman or any other gentleman to produce a paper or to produce a gentleman who says he signed any such paper.

Mr. MARSH. I say in addition, if the gentleman will permit me, while I have made no such charge that such is the case, nevertheless I have seen the statement published broadcast in the papers of the country, and the action of this House is calculated by voting down every amendment offered to the bill, meritorious or otherwise, to give color to the truth of such statement.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. I deny any such paper is in existence or that any member of this House has signed any such paper.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. If there had been such a paper signed as stated the action of gentlemen on this floor could not have been different from what it is in voting down every amendment offered.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's amendment does not propose to strike out any words, but merely proposes to insert.

Mr. MARSH. Yes; I move to strike out "$150,000" and insert "$349,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair supposed such was the gentleman's intention.

Mr. MARSH. And I do it in the interest of the navigation of a river now threatened with an impending overflow.

The amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. We have passed now the region of harbors and got into the region of rivers, and I ask to offer a general amendment which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 300, after the word "river," insert:

"Provided, That no money appropriated by this act shall be expended in the improvement of any stream, creek, rivulet, dam, lock, or modified mill-dam, notwithstanding the same may be designated and appropriated for by name herein, which is not within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the United States."

Now, Mr. Chairman, it seems there ought to be a line drawn somewhere.

A MEMBER. We have heard that already.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. Yes, and you will hear it oftener. There is at some point between the Atlantic Ocean and a dew-drop a place where it is proper to appropriate money and a place where it is not proper to appropriate money. I have endeavored all through this discussion to ascertain upon what principle this bill is based. Where are the limits? Where do appropriations properly stop? Where do they properly begin?

Now, I suggest that it be limited to those places which are within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the United States. I understand that to be the opinion of the committee. The gentleman from Massachusetts, speaking the other day I suppose for the committee—he being a member of the committee, and who feels authorized to deny the existence of any written agreement here to stand by this bill intact—says this is the principle upon which the bill is drawn. If that be true, then I suggest that it will not be a violation of such pledge, if it exists, to permit the insertion of this principle in the bill. The gentleman says in his speech—

A sufficient answer to this suggestion—

What suggestion is not made known—is in the fact that the navigable rivers belong to and are under the control of the United States.

If this is the opinion of the committee, then let this amendment be incorporated in the bill. If it is not the opinion of the committee, then let the gentleman from Massachusetts retract his statement. At least let it go upon the record that the members of the Committee on Commerce are seeking to induce the passage of the bill by pretensions which they are not willing to stand up to and incorporate in it.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. I will only say in response to the gentleman that if that be the law of the land it will take care of itself and does not need the gentleman's amendment. Gentlemen are endeavoring to pile amendment upon amendment to satisfy their own personal pleasure, while we have a law here defining that matter clearly.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 14, noes 68.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. I do not want to obstruct public business but I do want an expression of opinion on the part of the committee upon this amendment; and I therefore ask for tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. No quorum having voted the Chair will appoint tellers.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa, and Mr. WILSON were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 36, noes 82.

So (no further count being demanded) the amendment was not agreed to.

Improving Connecticut River, below Hartford, Connecticut, $30,000.

Mr. PHELPS. I offer an amendment to that paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add at the end of line 308 "of which sum $10,000 shall be used to continue the work in progress on the bar at the mouth of the river, and $3,000 in dredging the channel below Rocky Hill."

Mr. REAGAN. I understand that there is no objection to the insertion of that amendment in the bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Hudson River, New York, $15,000.

Mr. FORT. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to this paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert as a new paragraph after the word "dollars," in line 320, the following: "The Secretary of War is hereby directed to open negotiations with the State of New York with a view to ascertain whether that State would consent to enlarge the Erie Canal, so as to fully accommodate commerce and admit the use of steam vessels, and thus cheapen transportation; and in case said State does not propose to so enlarge said canal, then to ascertain on what terms it would cede said canal to the United States, or consent to its enlargement."

Mr. REAGAN. I make the point of order upon that amendment.

Mr. FORT. I do not expect the amendment to pass, but I hope the gentleman will withhold the point of order for a moment, as I have only a word to say upon it.

Mr. REAGAN. It might be a proper subject for a special bill, but it certainly is not appropriate to insert it in this bill. However, I will reserve the point of order upon it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois will proceed.

Mr. FORT. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say in reference to this matter that more commerce now floats through the Erie Canal than on all the rivers, creeks, bays, or bayous mentioned in this bill; and yet there is no appropriation for the improvement of that canal because it would not be proper to make an appropriation for that purpose. Almost the entire western country and the southwestern country are more interested in the improvement and enlargement of the Erie Canal than in any other enterprise, or in all other enterprises connected with water transportation of this country.

I make no complaint against the State of New York. She did well in first constructing the canal. It was a profitable enterprise for that State, and a profitable enterprise for the country. It has proved of immense value to the great western country, and to the eastern country also. The State of New York very properly, at one time, enlarged that canal. Originally its locks were only fourteen feet wide, I am informed, but the necessities of commerce demanded they should be enlarged, and the State subsequently enlarged the locks to a width of eighteen feet, a very considerable enlargement. But to-day the demands of commerce require that these locks shall be forty or fifty feet wide and two hundred feet—yes, and even larger—they ought to be seventy-five by four hundred, so that a propeller loaded in Chicago or other port on the lakes with 100,000 bushels of grain or other freight could pass through to New York City, and so that a whole fleet of small canal-boats of the present size could be locked through at one time.

I understand large locks could be added and leave the present locks to be used also. This canal should be so wide and so deep that the present mule-power could be superseded by steam-power for towage upon it. All this is even now demanded by the necessities of commerce, and more than this, will soon be a necessity for the western country. The broad, rich West has only just begun to send forward her millions and millions of tons of produce, and is just beginning to require the products of the East, all of which must pass through that canal. This amendment can do no harm. It only provides for procuring information. It involves no present expenditure. It may be only the beginning of what in the end might terminate in the enlargement of that canal either by the State of New York or by aid from the General Government, and make it what it ought to be, equal to the emergencies of commerce and the demands and necessities of a vast and growing trade between the East and the West. No gentleman can complain. Not a dollar is expended by this amendment. Nothing but information which may be of great importance is sought. Certainly no objection can be made by any member on this floor to this proposition, for the reason, as I have stated, that it is in the interest of the commerce of the country that this canal should be enlarged.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois looks to the acquisition by the United States by purchase or otherwise of the Erie Canal, and is not germane to this bill. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. FORT. Was the point of order insisted on?

The CHAIRMAN. It was.

Mr. FORT. Do I understand the chairman of the Committee on Commerce insists on the point of order against the amendment?

Mr. REAGAN. Yes, sir. The gentleman will understand that all matters about canals go to a different committee.

Mr. FORT. There are appropriations for canals in this bill. [Cries of "Regular order!"] As has just been stated by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. RUSSELL,] there are $500,000 appropriated for canals in this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair presumes the canals appropriated for in this bill belong to the Government; and this is a proposition to acquire by purchase or otherwise a canal belonging to the State of New York.

Mr. FORT. This is a proposition to connect the great navigable inland seas with a navigable river—Hudson River—and thus with the ocean; and it does seem to me when there can be no possible objection to such a proposition, the chairman of the Committee on Commerce will not insist on his point of order if it be admitted it is a good one.

Mr. REAGAN. I appreciate the great purpose the gentleman from Illinois has in view in offering his amendment; but he will remember such canals as the Des Moines Rapids Canal and the Portland Canal are so placed as to tide over interruptions in the rivers. Any question as to the construction of a canal, or such a question as that presented by the gentleman from Illinois, involving, as I take it, the purchase of a canal, would have to go to the Committee on Railways and Canals.

Mr. FORT. This only tides over the interruption between the great lakes and the Hudson River. I do not see why the gentleman from Texas should object.

Mr. BRAGG. Am I not correct in understanding that the Chair has ruled that amendment out of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did so; but the Chair permitted the gentleman from Illinois to appeal to the gentleman from Texas to withdraw the point of order.

The Clerk read the following:

Improving Cheesequake's Creek, New Jersey, $5,000.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I ask my friend from Iowa [Mr. UPDEGRAFF] if he can inform the committee where Cheesequake's Creek is? I fail to find it in any gazetteer or on any map.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. I cannot find Cheesequake's Creek without a telescope, except in the engineer's report. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa send up an amendment?

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. I move to strike out the paragraph. I wish to read an extract or two from the reports of injudicious friends in regard to Cheesequake's Creek:

Cheesequake's Creek is in the collection district of Amboy, and Perth Amboy is the nearest port of entry. The amount of revenue collected is $21,499.50. The amount of commerce to be benefited by it is ——.

The creek is bounded by salt-marsh its whole length, occasionally coming near the firm land in some of its bends. The drainage area is small, and there are no large fresh-water streams running into it, the largest being Buck Creek, which joins it a little above the railroad bridge.

The principal and nearly the only navigation of the creek is for the purpose of transporting clay for making stone-ware and molding-sand. A large proportion of this shipment is from the head of the creek, where there are several clay pits; and at the point called Salt Works and also at Forman's Dock there are clay pits being actively worked at present.

Another person says in a letter indorsed by the engineer:

Answering your favor of the 13th instant, the commerce of Cheesequake's Creek consists principally of clay and sand from the banks of Messrs. Forman, Whitehead Brothers, and myself. [Laughter.]

I have also a new brick-yard just opened and two more and a glass factory talked of being established on the creek, [laughter,] the latter improvements being made contingent, however, as I understand, on the improvements contemplated or planned by your office.

It is intended as soon as business revives to again commence the manufacture of brick. Parties are negotiating for a site to build a large glass-works on the creek and railroad.

I am reminded in connection with this appropriation and some others of an old story about Davy Crockett, according to which it appears he was able with one coon-skin to do all his treating on election day. In a rude grocery with a counter built upon poles, a coon-skin being a legal tender, he would treat his friends with one coon-skin. After he had given one treat the bartender would draw the coon-skin under the counter; and when Davy wanted to treat again he would draw it back through the poles and treat again, and so do all his treating for election day. [Laughter.] So with this port of entry collecting $21,000. I find the amount reported differently in two places. In one place the amount collected is stated as $5,000 and in another as $21,000. You pay your money and you take your choice. [Laughter.] I take the amount at $21,000; and I find there are five or six appropriations here, for which the revenue at this port of entry collecting $21,000 is cited as the basis upon which these appropriations should be granted, and $191,000 is the aggregate amount. Here are some of them: South River, New Jersey, $6,000; Cheesequake's Creek, New Jersey, $5,000; Rahway, New Jersey, $10,000; Shrewsbury River, New Jersey, $86,000 for that alone.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I wish to ask the gentleman if the Cheesequake's Creek empties into the Shrewsbury?

Mr. UPDEGRAFF of Iowa. No; but it is in the same $21,000 district. The Raritan River gets $25,000. If anybody will take the trouble to look through the Engineer's report, at pages 517, 519, 524, 542, 546, 547, &c., he will find that every one of those pages contain an estimate for an appropriation varying from $5,000 to $80,000; and this $21,000 revenue collected in this district is urged as the basis for all those appropriations. Now, if that is not equal to Davy Crockett's coon-skin I do not know what is.

Mr. ROSS. I do not propose to waste any of the time of this committee by replying to the remarks of the gentleman from Iowa, except so far as to have read by the Clerk some communications which I send to the desk.

Mr. WHITE. Let them be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Let them be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

UNITED STATES ENGINEER OFFICE,
New York, March 11, 1880.

DEAR SIR: I showed the inclosed to General Newton, and he said that it would be best now for you to send it directly to Mr. ROSS, so I return it to you.

Yours, respectfully,

R. H. TALCOTT,
Assistant Engineer.

T. W. MOORE, Esq., 36 Elizabeth Street, City.

| Sand, 40,000 tons, at $2 | $80,000 |
| Pottery-clay, 18,000 tons, at $3 | 54,000 |
| Hay, 4,000 tons, at $12 | 48,000 |
| Sage for the manufacture of paper, 1,500 tons, at $3 | 4,500 |
| Fertilizers, 37,500 tons, at $2 | 75,000 |
| Wood, 1,000 cords, at $4 | 4,000 |
| Ashes, 10,000 bushels, at 12 cents | 1,200 |
| Lime, 5,000 bushels, at 20 cents | 1,000 |
| Oysters, 2,300 bushels, $1 | 2,300 |
| Farm products | 300,000 |
| General merchandise | 100,000 |

There are on the creek three brick-yards, five clay-pits, ten docks, and one railway.

Five hundred and fifty-one sloops, schooners, &c., 44,000 tons, passed through the railroad draw at high tide during the past season.

Three-quarters of the pottery-clay used in the United States and Canada is taken from this creek, although it is now necessary to lighter a large portion of it at great expense.

Not over one-quarter of the beds are yet developed.

Before the bar obstructed navigation steamboats ran up to Jacksonville and the head of the creek, bringing out regularly full freights of produce, fruits, &c.

Long lines of farm-wagons waited their turn to discharge at the docks.

There are now five times as many truck farms as then, the products of which are driven from six to twenty miles to Keyport over often very bad roads, which very much reduces the profits.

A rich country extending twenty miles inland would be brought in communication with the New York markets by this improvement and increased in value at least 100 per cent.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. What paper is that which has just been read? I did not hear what it was.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman did not hear it read——

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I heard it read; but I do not know who authorized it.

The CHAIRMAN. It was read as a portion of the remarks of the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. ROSS.]

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. It is not in any report of an engineer.

The question was taken upon the motion of Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa, to strike out the pending paragraph; and upon a division there were—ayes 15, noes 102.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. No quorum has voted. I want a quorum to vote on making this appropriation for Cheesequake's Creek.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa, and Mr. WILSON were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 12, noes 135.

So the motion to strike out was not agreed to.

The Clerk read the following:

Improving Cohansey Creek, New Jersey, $7,000.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I move to strike out that paragraph. I have been looking over the engineer's report and I find that this is a little, short, tidal stream about four feet deep. But it seems to be sufficient to furnish a pretext for New Jersey, following the example of West Virginia and of Texas, to secure a few thousand dollars for every little mud-hole that can be discovered in that State.

Mr. CONGER. I think there is a very great misunderstanding in regard to the kind of navigable waters of the United States which it is proper for Congress to improve. I do not know anything in our law or practice that confines improvement of navigable waters to the great lakes, the great rivers, and the great channels of commerce. The whole commerce of our land is gathered from the places where the products are found, and carried by rail, by wagon, by boat down the smaller streams to the larger ones, and the commerce of the country is gathered together more or less at places on the larger streams and floated down to the lakes and finally to the ocean.

I did not, however, rise to comment upon that subject, but to say to this House that Congress has determined what kinds of waters are the channels of commerce, and has many times reiterated that determination in the solemn form of law. In looking for an expression of the opinion of Congress on that subject, I find that in 1871, when Congress passed a law in relation to navigation, to steamboats and vessels, and the security of life on such steamboats and vessels, Congress solemnly declared over what kinds of waters should be extended the laws of the United States relating to all questions of commerce, navigation, and the security of life. It is a short, simple, comprehensive, conclusive statement.

In February, 1871, Congress made that declaration of the kinds of waters over which these laws should extend. When Congress passed the compilation of the laws of the United States after mature and careful consideration it re-enacted that provision, and I desire to read it.

I will first state that when Congress had determined over what kinds of waters the laws of the United States regulating steamboats, vessels, and other craft should be exerted, it thereby determined what kinds of waters the commerce of the United States floated upon, and what kinds of waters it was proper to appropriate money for. In 1871 Congress passed an act to provide for the better security of life on board vessels plying on the navigable waters of the United States. In that act it declared that it should apply to "all lakes, bays, inlets, sounds, rivers, harbors, or other navigable waters of the United States, when such waters are common highways of commerce, or open to general or competitive navigation."

Now, that definition is as clear and conclusive as the Committee on Commerce at that time, after spending hours in trying to frame a definition, with the assistance of the head of the Treasury Department and with the aid of many other persons who were called in—there is the definition as clear as the Committee on Commerce could frame it; the one they presented to the House and which has been the law of the land ever since.

When the laws of the United States were compiled, years later, after reviewing the whole subject, and endeavoring to put in the best possible shape a definition of the navigable waters of the United States, Congress enacted this proposition:

Any waters of the United States which are common highways of commerce or open to general or competitive navigation.

Mr. ROBESON obtained the floor and said: I only want three minutes. I give two to my friend from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER.]

Mr. CONGER. I refer to this section of the Revised Statutes in order that every gentleman may see how careful is the definition of waters recognized as waters for commerce and navigation under the laws of the United States. I say that under the definition I have read, solemnly enacted and repeated, all the waters of the United States open to commerce or open to competitive navigation are navigable waters of the United States. The definition is clear and distinct. If there be a river so small that it is owned by a company it is not navigable water, and does not come under the operation of this law, but if the vessels navigating it are subject to these laws of the United States, then Congress has power to improve it; and whether the improvement shall be made is a matter of judgment or discretion.

Now as to the definition of navigable waters under the English common law. It happened that there was no navigable stream of Great Britain that was not a tide-water stream. Hence the navigability of a stream was made to depend in the common law upon whether it was a tide-water stream. That would exclude the Mississippi, the Ohio, all the great lakes, all the great inland rivers of the United States. But our courts have extended admirality jurisdiction over the lakes, contrary to the common-law doctrine, because although not tide-waters, they are in effect the great navigable waters of the United States.

The definition of our courts has, I think, been made in a very precise form in regard to what kinds of waters are public waters of the United States; and I call the attention of gentlemen on both sides to this definition: All streams capable in their natural state, at any season of the year, of valuable floatage, are public highways, subject to the easement and rights of the public thereon.

Those are the definitions adopted in our laws, and sanctioned by our courts; and when any of these streams over which our navigation laws extend are presented in the discretion of the Committee on Commerce for improvement, so as to make these streams capable of more valuable floatage, if in the judgment of this House they be such tributaries to commerce as to warrant the appropriation proposed, I think all this talk about large streams and small streams as a means of prejudicing appropriations are an attack on the commerce and navigation of this whole great land of ours. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROBESON] has only one minute remaining.

Mr. ROBESON. I only want one minute. Cohansey River is in my district.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Cohansey Creek, not river.

Mr. ROBESON. We call it "river" down in New Jersey.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. The committee calls it "creek."

Mr. ROBESON. Mr. Chairman, I am not a member of the Committee on Commerce. The appropriations for the Cohansey River and for Salem River, making together $10,000, are all that I have received in this bill for my district. I think I have deserved as much as that.

Now, the reason why this appropriation ought to be made is that Cohansey River is a direct tributary of the Delaware. For one hundred and ten miles the Delaware flows alongside my district, bearing to the ocean a commerce second only to that of the Mississippi and the Hudson. The Cohansey is one of the tributaries of the Delaware. Nature has made our country down there "stale, flat," and unproductive.

A MEMBER. Unprofitable.

Mr. ROBESON. But our people rise above the dull level of the country. [Laughter.] Because of the character of the country, many of our towns do not lie directly on the banks of the river, but are seated four or five miles back from it, beyond the sand spits and salt marshes which lie upon its immediate borders. Therefore we need that these tributary streams should be dredged out to facilitate the commerce of a great State.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, never in my life have I heard an argument for the payment of money by the American Congress like that which has been made by my friend from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER,] supplemented by the wonderful argument of the gentlemam from New Jersey, [Mr. ROBESON.] In response to the gentleman from Michigan, I say that because our statute law or our Federal judges have declared what are the waters of the United States for purposes of navigation it does not follow that we must necessarily appropriate money for all the objects that may be cooked up by a committee. Must we appropriate here, Mr. Chairman, for all the "valuable floatage" upon waters which are "public highways" by the decision of some court? Must we appropriate for rivers and streams which have never been heard of because they happen to run in the district of my friend from New Jersey? What is the name of the river he champions here?

A MEMBER. It is a creek.

Another MEMBER. Cohansey Creek.

Mr. COX. Cohansey! Whoever heard of Cohansey before? When was it ever before crystallized into eloquence? Why, here is Cohansey in the Gazetteer:

Cohansey, a post-office in Cumberland County, New Jersey.

What have we to do with "post-offices" in an appropriation bill of this kind? Does the gentleman want a one-horse mail run there by water navigation? [Laughter.] Cohansey! Mr. Chairman, this bill is nearly played out and is running emptyings. [Laughter.]

Mr. ROBESON. So I think.

Mr. COX. The gentleman is entitled to think so after his speech, for he said New Jersey had failed in many natural advantages, stale, flat, and unprofitable, except in men.

Mr. ROBESON. I said unproductive, and when I said that I remembered the gentleman derived his lineage from that State.

Mr. COX. But I never was a very productive person. [Laughter.] What has not my friend done for the Government of the United States? Just think of it! Here is a statesman who served with Grant. His mind expanded beyond the ordinary rivers in our States and beyond our harbors. He had the whole, universal marine element in his command, and then he comes down here to the little creek of Cohansey. [Laughter.] He sent out his navies irrespective of law—I was about to say, and of morality, but I will not say that since he has been elected to Congress. [Laughter.] He has gone all around our star, floating our flag everywhere. Now he comes down and asks for a little appropriation for a creek in New Jersey called Cohansey. [Laughter.] Great God! have we not run emptyings to come down to Cohansey? [Great laughter.]

Mr. CONGER. Mr. Chairman, I will not pause to notice the swallows floating on the bosom of the stream or nesting in the trees, but come right down to the point at issue in this discussion. I desire to continue what I had to say and which time prevented me from saying in my previous five minutes. I will read for the benefit of the gentleman the decision of the United States Supreme Court in 10 Wallace, 363, defining the meaning of the law which I have heretofore read in my remarks:

A different test must therefore be applied to determine the navigability of our rivers and that is found in their navigable capacity. Those rivers must be regarded as public navigable rivers in law which are navigable in fact, and they are navigable in fact when they are used, or are susceptible of being used, in their ordinary condition as highways for commerce over which trade and travel are, or may be, conducted in the customary modes of trade and travel on water. And they constitute navigable waters within the meaning of the act of Congress in contradistinction from the navigable waters of a State when they form in their ordinary condition by themselves or by uniting with other waters a continued highway over which commerce is, or may be, carried on with other States or foreign countries in the customary modes in which such commerce is conducted by water.

Now, sir, the question of a stream being within a State, or lying on the borders of a State, is entirely different and separate from entering or running through many States. The United States courts, which I take it have some authority here, decide against any such question, and declare that all these rivers and streams which are capable, in the language which I have used, of valuable floatage of trade, of commerce upon them, if they, by their continuance, flow into other rivers, and they into others and those to the sea are navigable waters within the meaning of the law of the United States.

The term "valuable floatage" is sufficient to cover all that is valuable in commerce. You may restrict it down to the flat-boats or you may enlarge it if you will to the greatest steamer which ever floated on our waters. All is valuable. That is the definition. Now, sir, I think the law is with the Committee on Commerce. I think the streams on which it is proposed to make the improvements come within the definition of the statute and is confirmed by the highest authority in our land. Therefore I think it is perfectly proper there should be given these appropriations to the improvement of these thousand arteries of commerce reaching up into the interior of our land and making the means of traffic and trade to the sea and out into the markets of the world.

Mr. REAGAN. If it is not the wish of the committee to vote on this pending amendment I will then move the committee rise. I will not, however, make that motion if it is the desire of the committee to vote. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. Is there an amendment pending?

The CHAIRMAN. There is.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. It is not in order to rise while an amendment is pending.

The CHAIRMAN. It is; but not to rise and report the bill.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. I desire to offer as a substitute for the pending amendment the following:

No money appropriated herein shall be expended on any stream which does not come within the definition of navigability as made by the laws of the United States.

Mr. REAGAN. I move the committee rise to close debate on this section and amendments thereto.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. I want to say a few words.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Texas that the committee rise.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. Have I not the floor?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognized the gentleman from Texas and he made the motion that the committee rise, and yielded to the gentleman from Iowa for a moment, saying that if anything should be offered which would produce debate he would insist upon the motion that the committee rise.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. I wish to say a few words in regard to that amendment. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"] I do not think time will be saved by that kind of conduct. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the gentleman from Texas as willing to yield to the request of the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. REAGAN. If it will close debate I will yield.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. I am willing to close debate if this is allowed.

The CHAIRMAN. That, then, is so understood.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. I desire to say, then, Mr. Chairman, that I am glad the attention of the House and the country is called to this subject. I am glad that the attention particularly of the great lawyers of this House is directed to this question. Every man in this country knows that every dollar of this appropriation ought to be confined to the navigable streams. I make no issue with gentlemen who have sought to define the navigability of waters. We might perhaps not agree entirely upon that point in the narrow limits of this debate. But that question has been settled by law and I am content to accept the gentleman's suggestion or implied suggestion to amend the bill so that the expenditure of this money shall be confined, as we deem it ought to be confined and as every man knows that it should be confined, to the navigable waters and none others. Now, I offer this as a substitute which I think can meet with no objection. It will commend itself to everybody; we can all agree upon it. If the definition is as the gentleman says it is, then I think we will all agree that this appropriation should be confined to the navigable streams, and with that view and accepting his suggestion I seek and hope to incorporate this in the bill. It has been urged here in behalf of the Committee on Commerce, and also urged as a reason why this bill should pass, that they have confined appropriations to streams navigable under the laws of the United States. That being so, then I ask how in the name of good faith can they refuse to incorporate this provision in the bill which they say to the country is there now? If it is there now it can do no harm to put it in expressly as I desire.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa as a substitute.

Mr. MARSH. Let it be again read.

The amendment was again reported.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 67, noes 91.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa, demanded tellers.

Tellers were not ordered, eight members only voting in favor thereof.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. COX. I move to strike out the last word, not for the purpose of debating this question, but simply to ask leave to print some extracts from the messages of democratic Presidents, which show the nature and character of their opposition to this bill.

There was no objection.

The extracts are as follows:

President Polk, in his veto of the river and harbor bill in 1846, goes on to say:

Should this bill become a law, the same principle which authorizes the appropriations which it proposes to make would also authorize similar appropriations for the improvement of all the other bays, inlets, and creeks which may with equal propriety be called harbors, and of all the rivers, important or unimportant, in every part of the Union. To sanction the bill with such provisions would be to concede the principle that the Federal Government possesses the power to expend the public money in a general system of internal improvements, limited in its extent only by the ever-varying discretion of successive Congresses and successive Executives. It would be to efface and remove the limitations and restrictions of power which the Constitution has wisely provided, to limit the authority and action of the Federal Government to a few well-defined and specified objects. Besides these objections, the practical evils which must flow from the exercise on the part of the Federal Government of the powers asserted in this bill impress my mind with a grave sense of my duty to avert them from the country as far as my constitutional action may enable me to do so.

It not only leads to a consolidation of power in the Federal Government, at the expense of the rightful authority of the States, but its inevitable tendency is to embrace objects for the expenditure of the public money which are local in their character, benefiting but few at the expense of the common Treasury of the whole. It will engender sectional feelings and prejudices calculated to disturb the harmony of the Union. It will destroy the harmony which should prevail in our legislative councils.

It will produce combinations of local and sectional interests, strong enough, when united, to carry propositions for appropriations of public money which could not of themselves, and standing alone, succeed, and cannot fail to lead to wasteful and extravagant expenditures.

It must produce a disreputable scramble for the public money by the conflict which is inseparable from such a system between local and individual interests and the general interest of the whole. It is unjust to those States which have with their own means constructed their own internal improvements to make from the common Treasury appropriations for similar improvements in other States.

In its operation it will be oppressive and unjust toward those States whose representatives and people either deny or doubt the existence of the power, or think its exercise inexpedient, and who, while they equally contribute to the Treasury, cannot consistently with their opinions engage in the general competition for a share of the public money. Thus a large portion of the Union in numbers and in geographical extent, contributing its equal proportion of taxes to the support of the Government, would, under the operation of such a system, be compelled to see the national treasure—the common stock of all—unequally disbursed and often improvidently wasted, for the advantage of small sections, instead of being applied to the great national purposes in which all have a common interest, and for which alone the power to collect the revenue was given.

The wisdom of the framers of the Constitution in withholding power over such objects from the Federal Government and leaving them to the local government of the States, becomes more and more manifest with every year's experience of the operations of our system.

Mr. Pierce, in his internal improvement message in 1854, says:

It is a remarkable fact, that for a period of more than thirty years after the adoption of the Constitution all appropriations of this class were confined, with scarcely an apparent exception, to the construction of light-houses, beacons, buoys, and public piers, and the stakage of channels; to render navigation "safe and easy," it is true, but only by indicating to the navigator obstacles in his way, not by removing those obstacles, nor in any other respect changing artificially the pre-existing natural condition of the earth and sea. It is obvious, however, that works of art for the removal of natural impediments to navigation, or to prevent their formation or for supplying harbors where these do not exist, are also means of rendering navigation safe and easy, and may in supposable cases be the most efficient as well as the most economical of such means. Nevertheless, it is not until the year 1824, that in an act to improve the navigation of the rivers Ohio and Mississippi, and in another act making appropriations for deepening the channel leading into the harbor of Presque Isle, on Lake Erie, and for repairing Plymouth Beach in Massachusetts Bay, we have any example of an appropriation for the improvement of harbors in the nature of those provided for in the bill returned by me to the House of Representatives.

* * * * * * *

One other peculiarity in this course of legislation is not less remarkable. It is that when the General Government first took charge of light-houses and beacons it required the works themselves and the lands on which they were situated to be ceded to the United States. And although for a time this precaution was neglected in the case of new works, in the sequel it was provided by general laws that no light-house should be constructed on any site previous to the jurisdiction over the same being ceded to the United States.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. COX, it was not agreed to.

The Clerk read the following:

Improving South River, New Jersey, $6,000.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. I move to strike out this paragraph.

This South River, New Jersey, is one of the coon-skin creeks. The length of the stream is given here in the report of the engineer as six miles. I do not wish to read much from the report. I will read only a single sentence, and then I am through.

It is proposed—

The engineer says—I read from page 520—

It is proposed to obtain six feet at mean low-water from the village up to Bisset's brickyard.

That is the object of this appropriation; to obtain a six-foot channel from the village up to Bisset's brickyard. That is all. [Laughter.]

The amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read the following:

Improving Broad Kiln River, Delaware, $5,000.

Mr. EINSTEIN. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

Insert after the paragraph just read the following:

"Provided, That no appropriation shall be made for improvements local to any State that has repudiated the payment of interest on its interest-bearing indebtedness or has refused to recognize the validity of any bonds it has issued."

Mr. WARNER. Is that aimed at the State of Minnesota?

Mr. REAGAN. I make the point of order on that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Texas state the grounds on which he makes the point of order?

Mr. REAGAN. I make the point of order on the ground that the amendment attempts to regulate a subject unconnected with rivers and harbors; that it prescribes a rule that shall affect the action of States with reference to their debts.

The CHAIRMAN. Is not that a question for the committee to determine, whether it has power to do that or not, and not a question for the Chair?

Mr. BLAND. It is not germane.

Mr. REAGAN. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that an amendment can hardly be considered germane to the bill which provides a regulation to govern the conduct of a State with reference to its indebtedness and to determine whether it shall have benefits by the payment or non-payment of its indebtedness. That is a subject entirely foreign to this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. It relates, however, to the expenditure under this bill, and the committee has power to regulate that. Of course it would not regulate the action of a State because a State could still persist in any policy it saw proper to adopt. But the object is to prevent the expenditure of money in a State which pursues a certain line of policy; and that is a question, the Chair thinks, for the committee and not for the Chair to determine.

Mr. REAGAN. Very well.

Mr. MARTIN, of Delaware. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York to what State he makes reference in his amendment?

Mr. EINSTEIN. Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to detain the committee very long in discussing the amendment I have offered. I claim that it is pertinent and germane to the bill, inasmuch as it reduces expenses and affects interests connected with it. The gentleman from Delaware has just asked me what States I refer to in my amendment. I am sorry to answer a great many, and also I regret very much to find that he knows so little of his country's history, or rather the disgrace that rests on individual States of our country in the estimation of the civilized nations of the earth, that he should not know that this repudiating business has extended from away up in the far northwest, in a State whose soil and wealth has become a proverb, down along the Mississippi River and the Southern Atlantic seaboard to the very Gulf of Mexico. I do not wish to say much on this subject; unfortunately it is too familiar to us all; but I do assert that in all fairness, in all equity, in all decency, and in all justice, the people of the United States, many of whom have been defrauded by the repudiating States (widows and orphans among the number) and who pay taxes to support this Government, should not be called upon to contribute toward local improvements in a portion of the land where everything has been done to impoverish them and make worthless their investments. On these broad principles I submit my amendment to the sense of justice of the House and of the American people.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I desire to make an inquiry of the gentleman from New York. I understand him, then, that he will inhibit the city of New York from purchasing tobacco of Virginia and cotton of Mississippi?

Mr. EINSTEIN. The gentleman from Tennessee knows very well that he has just made a fallacious insinuation and a very poor argument. Traders will go anywhere to purchase whatever articles they can reap a profit from and will not trouble themselves very much about the moral status of the State government.

Mr. McMAHON. I ask the gentleman from New York whether the citizens of his city and State did not get all their money back when in 1869 an act was passed making their bonds that had cost them forty cents on the dollar payable dollar for dollar in gold?

Mr. EINSTEIN. I do not know what the gentleman means by his question and what possible bearing it can have on the amendment I have offered or the remarks I have made.

Mr. REAGAN. I move that the committee rise for the purpose of closing debate on the pending amendment. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. REAGAN. If there is to be a vote, I will withdraw the motion.

The question being taken on Mr. EINSTEIN'S amendment, it was not agreed to.

The Clerk read the following:

For the improvement of the Mississippi River, in accordance with the plan therefor adopted by the Mississippi River commission, to be expended by the Secretary of War, with the advice and under the supervision of said commission, the sum of $1,000,000. And it shall be the duty of said commission to take into consideration, and of the Secretary of War to extend operations, under their supervision to, tributaries of the Mississippi River to the extent, and no further, that may be necessary in the judgment of said commission to the perfection of the general and permanent improvement of said Mississippi River; but this clause shall not be construed to interfere with the prosecution by the War Department of the improvement of said Mississippi River and its tributaries under general appropriations made therefor.

Mr. MARSH. I rise to a question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MARSH. The first line of the clause which has just been read is as follows:

For the improvement of the Mississippi River in accordance with the plan therefor adopted by the Mississippi River commission.

The point I make is that the paragraph is not germane to this bill. This is a bill for the improvement of the navigation of the rivers and the harbors of this country; and while a cursory view of this clause might induce us to believe it was an attempt to improve, yet in order to understand it correctly it is necessary that the Chair should make reference to the plan that is proposed by the Mississippi River commission.

Now, Mr. Chairman, that plan is very distinctly set forth in the report of that commission, known as House Executive Document No. 53 of the second session of the Forty-sixth Congress. That plan has two objects in view; the plan referred to in this bill, and which is the plan of the Mississippi River commission. One is the improvement of the channel, and thereby the navigation of the river; and the other is the building up, the repairing, and the maintaining of levees from Cairo to the city of New Orleans. I hold that the construction of levees for the purpose of reclaiming land from overflow, or for the purpose of protecting post-roads upon these low lands, or for the purpose of protecting railroads that have been built or that may hereafter be built upon these low lands, is not germane to a bill that proposes to appropriate money for the improvement of rivers and harbors.

I will call the attention of members of this Committee of the Whole to portions of that report of the Mississippi River commission, in which is embodied the plan for the carrying into execution of which it is proposed to appropriate $1,000,000. That commision says distinctly that "while it is not claimed that levees in themselves are necessary as a means of securing ultimately a deep channel for navigation," yet further on the commission says that "a levee system aids and facilitates the postal service by protecting from injury and destruction by freshets and floods the various common roads and railways upon which that service is conducted to and from the river bank, and generally within that portion of the alluvial region subject to overflow." Now, it must be clear to the mind of any gentleman from the report of the majority of this commission——

Mr. BLAND. I rise to a question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLAND. My point of order is that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MARSH] is proceeding out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. In what respect?

Mr. BLAND. There is no amendment pending before the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has made a point of order against the pending paragraph. The Chair is of the opinion that the gentleman is not confining himself strictly to the point of order, and will request him to do so.

Mr. MARSH. I think I am confining my remarks strictly to the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MARSH] suppose it to be the province of the presiding officer of the Committee of the Whole to pass judgment upon the merits of the various plans of improvement contained in this bill?

Mr. MARSH. I do not; and with all respect to the Chair there is nothing in my remarks to justify that inquiry. I am confining my remarks to the plan upon which it is proposed this $1,000,000 shall be expended. That plan is not to be found in this bill. The gentlemen who prepared this bill carefully avoided anything which would permit the House to determine from the bill itself what is the plan upon which this $1,000,000 is to be expended.

I understand that this report of the Mississippi River commission contains the plan which is referred to in this bill, and it is to the contents of that plan that I am endeavoring to direct the attention of the Chair, in order to show that the expenditure of money under such plan is not germane to a bill that proposes to appropriate money for the improvement of the navigable rivers and of the harbors of the country.

As I stated in my first remarks, I have endeavored to show that there are two distinct plans, or rather two distinct objects to be accomplished under the plan referred to in this bill. One is the building of levees to protect from overflow the alluvial lands from Cairo to New Orleans; the other is to build levees to protect the post-roads that are upon those low lands.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will allow the Chair to call his attention to the fact that this appropriation——

Mr. MARSH. Allow me to make one other remark. Another object is to protect from overflow those low lands so that railroads may run over them unobstructed.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill expressly provides that this appropriation is "for the improvement of the Mississippi River." The Chair cannot determine whether the plan is good or bad.

Mr. MARSH. That is very true. But when the bill so says, it also says that the improvement shall be carried on in accordance with the plan proposed by the Mississippi River commission.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair cannot determine or decide whether that plan is a good one or a bad one.

Mr. MARSH. I am not discussing the question whether it is a good or a bad plan; but I am discussing the question whether the building up or maintaining of a levee system on the Mississippi River is a matter germane to the improvement of the navigation of that river.

Mr. MONEY. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. MARSH. I do not want to be taken off the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is entirely willing to listen to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MARSH] for any reasonable length of time to discuss the point of order. But the Chair does not see any point of order in this question at all; it is a matter for the committee to decide.

Mr. MARSH. If the Chair will permit me to proceed a few minutes longer, perhaps I can enable the Chair to see my point.

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly the Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. HOOKER. I submit that the gentleman is out of order unless he states his point of order so that the Chair can decide upon it.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Illinois state distinctly what is his point of order?

Mr. MARSH. My point of order—I thought I had stated it distinctly—is that this proposed appropriation of $1,000,000 for the improvement of the Mississippi River from Cairo to New Orleans according to the plan—mark the language—according to the plan which has been proposed by the Mississippi River commission, is not germane to a bill proposing to make appropriations for rivers and harbors. In good faith, Mr. Chairman, I was endeavoring to call your attention and the attention of this House to the fact that the plan referred to, instead of being a plan for the improvement of the channel of that river in the interest of navigation and the interest of the great commerce that floats upon the river, has in view the building up of the levees and reclaiming the alluvial and overflowed lands of that country.

The CHAIRMAN. The question resolves itself——

Mr. MARSH. And in evidence of that——

Mr. FROST. I call the gentleman to order.

Mr. MARSH. I desire further [cries of "Order!"] to call attention——

Mr. FROST. I call the gentleman to order, and I insist upon my point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair might as well state now as at any time that he will not look into the plans upon which these improvements are proposed to be made, for the purpose of determining their merits or demerits.

Mr. MARSH. I did not ask the Chair to do that.

The CHAIRMAN. Why, the gentleman has read from the report of the commission, and has asked the Chair to go into an examination of the plan embraced in that report.

Mr. MARSH. For the purpose of showing——

Mr. FROST. I make the point that the gentleman from Illinois, having been ruled out of order, must, under the rules of the House, take his seat. I demand the enforcement of the rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is always willing—not only willing, but anxious—to hear the views of gentlemen on any point of order that may be submitted.

Mr. FROST. I demand the enforcement of the rule.

The CHAIRMAN. But the Chair does not see that any point of order for the decision of the Chair is involved in the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MARSH. Well, Mr. Chairman, suppose, if you will permit me——

Mr. FROST. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Is not the gentleman from Illinois compelled to take his seat under the rules of this House, having been ruled out of order?

The CHAIRMAN. All gentlemen will suspend until order is restored. Gentlemen will take their seats and preserve order.

Mr. MARSH. Let me say, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. FROST. I ask for the ruling of the Chair on my parliamentary question.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has ruled that the gentleman from Illinois——

Mr. MARSH. I say, in answer to the remark of the Chair——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has ruled that the gentleman from Illinois is not, in the opinion of the Chair, discussing the question of order, but a question as to the merits of the bill, and that the discussion ought to be addressed to the Committee of the Whole, not to the presiding officer.

Mr. MARSH. Then I will try to conform myself to the rules of order according to the construction given by the Chair.

Mr. ATHERTON. I want to make just one suggestion.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is on the floor, and the Chair hopes he will not be interrupted until the Chair can hear what his point of order is.

Mr. MARSH. In answer to the remark made by the Chair to me that he would not look into the plans under which this money was to be expended in order to determine whether the provision is germane to the bill, permit me to say that if the plan had been embodied in the bill verbatim et literatim as it appears in the report referred to by the bill, the Chair would have been bound to look at it; and it seems to me, by parity of reason, it is his duty to look into the plan, whether it is embodied in the bill verbatim et literatim or whether it is simply referred to in the bill. It is made a part of the bill by the reference of the bill to the plan as the plan under which this million dollars shall be expended.

Now, suppose, Mr. Chairman—and I am sorry that I am wearying you; it is not often I take the time of this House, and it is somewhat mortifying to me to find that in the few moments I have occupied I have wearied the chairman—suppose, sir, that this plan is adopted by the Mississippi River convention provided for the construction of a railroad from Cairo to New Orleans, and that an appropriation was made in language like that in the bill referring to that plan; suppose it should be found that the plan embraced in the report was for the construction of a railroad from Cairo to New Orleans, could not the chairman look into that plan—[cries of "Order!"]

Mr. HOUSE. I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee will state his point of order.

Mr. HOUSE. The gentleman from Illinois is not discussing the point of order. If he is not, he has no right to consume the time of the House, however loud he may speak or however anxious he may be to be heard.

Mr. MARSH. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Tennessee has not correctly represented me or the Chair. The Chair decided five minutes ago that I was not discussing this point of order, but he has not decided since that decision that I am not. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks there is no real question of order—that is, a question for the presiding officer of the committee to decide—involved in the proposition which the gentleman has made. Now, if the gentleman is not satisfied with that decision, the Chair hopes he will take an appeal to the committee and let the committee decide.

Mr. HOUSE. And I object to any further discussion.

Mr. KENNA. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say just one word if the House will hear me.

Mr. MARSH. I desire to amend this bill.

Mr. KENNA. I decline to yield the floor.

Mr. MARSH. If the point has been overruled, I desire to move an amendment.

Mr. KENNA. I only wish to say a word.

Mr. MARSH. I desire to offer an amendment, and I have not yielded the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman was addressing the Chair and not the committee, and the Chair has recognized a member of the committee, and he will recognize the gentleman from Illinois in due time.

Mr. MARSH. Will the Chair recognize me to offer an amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly; at the proper time. The Chair will not pass from this or any other paragraph so long as any gentleman on the floor desires to move an amendment to it.

Mr. KENNA. I wish the House to hear me in a mere statement. A great deal has been said by the gentleman from Illinois about the effect which the clause of the bill criticised by him will have; and something has been said in not the kindest strain by the gentleman in reference to the purposes of the committee.

Mr. HAZELTON. On what point is the gentleman addressing the committee?

Mr. KENNA. I will move to strike out the last word, if the gentleman is particular about it.

Mr. PAGE. I call the gentleman to order.

Mr. KENNA. I have the floor.

Mr. PAGE. But there is a point of order pending.

Mr. KENNA. No; there is not a point of order pending.

Mr. PAGE. Then I make one.

Mr. KENNA. I decline to yield.

The CHAIRMAN. But the gentleman desires to rise to a question of order, and that the Chair must entertain before the committee proceeds to the consideration of the paragraph.

Mr. PAGE. The gentleman is not speaking on a question before the committee.

Mr. KENNA. I made a motion to strike out the last word.

Mr. PAGE. That is not in order so long as a point of order is pending. I rose for the purpose of making a point of order after the gentleman from Illinois had been ruled out.

Mr. KENNA. The gentleman from California cannot take me from the floor to make a point of order.

Mr. PAGE. Why not? The gentleman from Illinois made a point of order, and while on the floor the Chair made some suggestion, and he then said, after the point of order was ruled out, he desired to move to amend. I immediately rose and said I desired to make a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. All points of order having been reserved against this bill, the Chair thinks he ought to allow all gentlemen to present points before we proceed to consider the paragraph; for if not, it would then be too late.

Mr. KENNA. I hope the gentleman will withhold his point of order for a few moments.

Mr. PAGE. I will not be a moment in making my statement.

Mr. KENNA. It is due to the committee who reported this bill that the statement should be at least allowed to be made here that the criticism——

Mr. PAGE. I have no objection to the gentleman making it after I have made my point of order. I make the point that the provision in this bill for the improvement of the Mississippi River in accordance with the plan adopted by the Mississippi River commission changes existing law; that there is no law for any appropriation for the improvement of the Mississippi River in accordance with that plan, and all appropriations heretofore have been made under the supervision of the Secretary of War, and this clause provides that the work shall be taken away from the Secretary of War and completed under the direction of the Mississippi River commission, which I claim to be a change of existing law and not in the interests of economy.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decided yesterday after very full debate and after a good deal of consideration of the subject that the river and harbor appropriation bill is not technically a general appropriation bill so as to come within the rule relating to that character of bills; and if the decision be correct, then the fact that it changes existing law would not be ground for the point of order.

Mr. PAGE. I then ask the Chair what rules govern this committee on a special appropriation bill?

The CHAIRMAN. Just the same that govern this committee in the consideration of any other bill except the general appropriation bills, which have a peculiar rule for themselves.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I make the point of order that this is a bill to appropriate a million dollars for certain levees on the Mississippi River. This bill makes the report of the commission a part of it, and by that report we see that this money is wanted to build levees and not for making the river navigable at all. I make the point of order on that that it is not a proper appropriation to be made in such a bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Committee on Commerce report a bill for the improvement of the river. Now, it may be that the committee was of opinion that the river could be best improved by the construction of levees, in which opinion the Chair might not concur, but it is not a question for the Chair to determine, as the Chair understands, now.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. That is the condition that the bill is in at all events. It so provides, and I make the point of order.

Mr. FROST. On the point of order I would like to say a word——

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will rise to receive a message from the Senate.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. ROBESON having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. BURCH, its Secretary, was received, announcing that the Senate insists upon its amendment to the bill of the House No. 3047, to authorize the commissioners of the District of Columbia to recommend a proper site for a union railroad depot in the city of Washington, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and agreed to the conference asked; and further that Messrs. WHYTE, WITHERS, and ROLLINS had been appointed conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed bills and joint resolutions of the following titles, in which concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

Joint resolution (S. R. No. 70) to provide for the detail of retired officers of the Army to colleges, universities, and other incorporated institutions of learning;

Joint resolution (S. R. No. 162) to grant the use of artillery, tents, &c., to be used at the soldiers' reunion to be held in Maine in 1881;

A bill (S. No. 1432) granting a pension to Angus McAuley;

A bill (S. No. 2094) for the relief of M. J. Flood, widow of George W. Flood; and

A bill (S. No. 2184) to authorize the commissioners of the District of Columbia to appoint additional policemen for temporary service in the District, and for other purposes.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. KENNA. I desire now, Mr. Chairman, to say a word in answer to the remark made by the gentleman from Illinois, and also the gentleman from New York, which should be answered by somebody in order that the attitude of the Committee on Commerce may not be misunderstood in reference to this provision. I will state now emphatically that there never was and never has been a purpose on the part of the committee in reporting this bill, or this clause of the bill, to undertake to provide a system for building levees or for reclaiming the swamp and overflowed or alluvial lands on that river, or for any purpose looking to such a result. The only object in view has been the improvement of the navigation of the Mississippi River. The Committee on Commerce believes that this clause, as incorporated in this bill, seeks to accomplish that purpose, and none other. But whether it does accomplish it or not I am quite sure, and I hope the House will understand it, that whenever a proposition is introduced here which seeks to impose restrictions upon the expenditure of this money for any purpose other than that contemplated in the mind of the committee in framing the bill, there will be no objection on the part of the committee to its adoption. That is all I desire to say.

Mr. THOMAS. I offer an amendment at this point.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the paragraph the following:

"Provided, That no part of such sum shall be expended for the purpose of reclaiming the swamp, overflowed, or alluvial lands along said Mississippi River, but shall be confined strictly to improving the channel and thereby the navigation of said river."

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Chairman, a member of the Committee on Commerce has notified this committee that it was not the purpose of that committee in recommending this appropriation to apply any part of it to building levees, reclaiming swamp, overflowed, or alluvial lands; and if such is the case—if the improvement of the navigation of the Mississippi River is the only object in view—then the amendment I have offered must be satisfactory to all concerned as it confines the appropriation strictly to that purpose.

It has been suggested by the Chair that the building of levees at certain points might benefit the——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair said that such might be the opinion of the committee.

Mr. THOMAS. It was suggested by the Chair that the plan might involve the building of levees, in which plan the Chair might not agree, as I remember his language: that by the building of levees at certain points the navigation of the river might thereby be improved. Now, I submit that it is not the duty of this House, it is not the duty of this nation to make appropriations of the people's money for the purpose of reclaiming these swamp and overflowed lands: and that any money appropriated in this bill should be confined to those improvements and works which are clearly within the scope and legitimate purpose of the bill, which is to improve the navigation of the river and thereby add to the commerce of the country.

Mr. GIBSON. I would like to say, Mr. Chairman, to the gentleman from Illinois, and repeat now what I said on a former occasion, that his amendment or that of the gentleman from New York, or Massachusetts, or any amendment that is deemed essential to confine the appropriation to the absolute improvement of the navigation of the river is perfectly acceptable to gentlemen representing that section of country on this floor. They have no purpose to reclaim these lands: they have no object to accomplish save the absolute improvement of the river itself. It is not contemplated or sought to reclaim the alluvial or overflowed lands.

Mr. BUCKNER. There is nothing in the bill that looks to the accomplishment of that purpose, as far as I can see.

Mr. ROBINSON. If the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. THOMAS] will give me his attention for a moment I wish to suggest to him that I have prepared an amendment somewhat in the line of the remarks I made a few days since on this very point; and since it seems to me it covers some points his amendment does not, I would like to have it read, and perhaps the gentleman may accept it instead of his own.

Mr. THOMAS. I have no objection to hearing it read.

Mr. ROBINSON. And perhaps you will accept it.

Mr. THOMAS. I can judge of that after hearing it.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of line 364 add the following:

"Provided, That no portion of the sum hereby appropriated shall be used in the repair or construction of levees for the purpose of preventing injury to lands by overflow or for any other purpose whatever, except as a means of deepening or improving the channel of said river. And it shall be the duty of said commission to make report on or before the 1st day of January next to the Secretary of War, for transmission by him to Congress of a detailed statement of the work done, and of the expenditure made from the sum hereby appropriated, with their judgment upon the effect of such work and the general practicability, and estimates of the total cost of such improvements along such river from Cairo to the head of the passes."

Mr. GIBSON. I will say to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROBINSON] that that amendment certainly confines the appropriation to its legitimate purposes, and is perfectly acceptable to the gentlemen who are interested in these improvements.

Mr. ROBINSON. I move that as a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. THOMAS.]

Mr. REAGAN rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROBINSON] is entitled to the floor to speak on his amendment.

Mr. REAGAN. I will ask the gentleman from Massachusetts to let me say a word.

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the gentleman if I do not thereby lose the floor.

Mr. REAGAN. I merely wish to say that the entire committee, as I understand, approve of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. ROBINSON. If I can have a few minutes, I think I can explain this amendment.

My purpose the other day, Mr. Chairman, was to say I was not in favor of repairing or building the levees for the protection of lands along the river. The commission, composed of several very eminent gentlemen whose names are well known throughout the country, are not united in their recommendation. The majority, however, say—as gentlemen will find by examining the report, my friend from Illinois only reading a part of what is said on that point in the report—they say it will be desirable to hasten the work of channel improvement through the increased scour and depth of the river-bed.

Now, as you, Mr. Chairman, very wisely said a moment ago, you might not agree with the engineers and I perhaps differ with them; but I certainly hold my judgment subordinate to theirs in that I think the House and the country are quite ready to submit to the views of men learned and experienced in such matters.

I have drawn the amendment so that the commission may, if they deem it necessary in the improvement and deepening of the channel of the river, repair the break in a levee. If they believe that when the water is at a high stage, by stopping it from overflowing and creating a swifter and deeper and stronger current, a greater scour of the river can be accomplished, I want to leave them that power. I would not take it away from them. I regard this as experimental in a large degree. Gentlemen differ about it, but I believe we are ready to try to that extent the plan the commission have recommended. I think the provision I have suggested will not be objected to. I think nobody upon that commission is willing the Secretary of War should expend any money for the purpose of protecting the lands from overflow.

Now I ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. THOMAS] who offered the amendment to observe that his language goes further—and, I submit to him, in a dangerous way—it goes further than he thinks, if he will allow me to say so; because he uses the word "navigation." And no gentlemen understand the force of that word better than the gentlemen who want to have the levees repaired to make landing places for boats and facilities for trade. In my amendment I leave that out; and I submit to the gentleman he ought to have left that out of his amendment, because with the phrase "navigation" in addition to "improving the channel" it might be plausibly urged that Congress intended those great works to include the purpose of bringing the boats to land. If the gentleman will examine the report of the commission he will find that on the fifteenth page the commission discuss that view of the navigation of the river. In my amendment I confine it simply to the deepening and improvement of the channel of the river—not even of the river simply, for fear it would take too wide a range. I have taken care that the words should be very precise. If they do not precisely meet the case I would be glad to have them amended. But I submit to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. THOMAS] that he has in his amendment, as I conceive, some dangerous words which would take the force very much out of what he proposes.

Mr. DUNN rose.

Mr. COWGILL. I would be glad to have the substitute offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts again read.

The proposed substitute was again read.

Mr. ROBINSON. If the committee will allow me I will say just one word further. I have provided in this amendment for a report to be made on or before the 1st day of January next. Let these gentlemen go out hedged as they will be by that provision, and come back here and make report of their doings and their expenditures to the next Congress, and Congress will then be ready to determine what action it should take.

Mr. DUNN. I am satisfied that there is a great deal of unnecessary apprehension in regard to this plan of improving the Mississippi River. I oppose this amendment because I think it is altogether unnecessary as providing against a thing not contemplated.

I desire to call the attention of this committee to the original act creating this commission. I call attention of gentlemen to the language employed in that act, and I ask attention to the plan of improvement in connection with that act, for I think it is worthy of consideration and attention. The fourth section of the act is as follows:

It shall be the duty of said commission to take into consideration and mature such plan or plans and estimates as will correct, permanently locate, and deepen the channel and protect the banks of the Mississippi River; improve and give safety and ease to the navigation thereof; prevent destructive floods; promote and facilitate commerce, trade, and the postal service; and when so prepared and matured, to submit to the Secretary of War a full and detailed report of their proceedings and actions, and of such plans, with estimates of the cost thereof, for the purposes aforesaid, to be by him transmitted to Congress: Provided,—

I call attention now to the proviso:

Provided, That the commission shall report in full upon the practicability, feasibility, and probable cost of the various plans known as the jetty system, the levee system, and the outlet system, as well as upon such others as they deem necessary.

Now, the commission, in their report, have reported, first, upon the outlet system, and condemned it; secondly, upon the levee system separately and distinctly, which they set out, not as an absolute plan of improvement, but as a system both for improvement and for reclamation. They do not recommend its adoption, but they state the cost of filling the gaps in the levees. That part of their report is as follows:

THE LEVEE SYSTEM.

Levees have never been erected upon the banks of the Mississippi River except for the special purpose of protecting the alluvial lands from overflow. They have therefore always had sole reference to the high-water stage; and the degree to which levees might be prudently relied upon "to improve and give safety to navigation," "promote and facilitate commerce, trade, and the postal service," has not hitherto entered into the question of the construction and maintenance of a levee system.

There is no doubt that the levees exert a direct action in deepening the channel and enlarging the bed of the river during those periods of "rise" or "flood" when by preventing the dispersion of the flood-waters over the adjacent low-lands, either over the river banks or through bayous and other openings, they actually cause the water to rise to a higher level within the river-bed than it would attain if not thus restrained.

It would seem to follow, from the law that the volume of water flowing in the bed determines the size, that prior to the construction of levees the area of the mean cross-section of bed of the Mississippi River must have been less than it was after the levees had reached their most efficient condition, assuming, what is believed to be true, that the average rainfall in the Mississippi Valley has not materially changed within the last hundred years.

There is some evidence in a comparison of the results of Young, Poussin, and Tuttle's examination of 1821, with later surveys, that the width of the river has increased since that date.

As silt-bearing streams in alluvial districts have a tendency to assume in the straight reaches cross-sections which are arcs of circles, and in the bends curves of deeper forms, it follows that any general widening of the river resulting from concentration or increase of volume, which may have taken place, would as a rule be accompanied by a general and corresponding deepening as the result of such general enlargement, although local shoalings, temporarily injurious to navigation, might occur.

There is reason to believe that during the period when levees were in their most perfect condition, from 1850 to 1858, the channel of the river was better generally for purposes of navigation than it has been since that time.

It is known that during the last twenty years the levee system has been continuously interrupted by a great number of crevasses between Cairo and Red River.

Before the levees were built, a large portion of the flood-waters spread out over the banks of the river in a thin sheet, of which the average depth at the margin of the stream, where it escaped, did not probably exceed a few inches, or, at most, a foot. The immediate effect of the leeves would be to increase the volume and height and accelerate the velocity of the flood-waters between them, resulting in an erosion and deepening of the river-bed, and ultimately in a corresponding lowering of the flood slope in accordance with the general law already quoted, that an increase in the normal volume of discharge in a sedimentary stream, flowing through alluvial deposits, results ultimately in a lowering of the flood surface. It would seem, therefore, that a closure of the crevasses might be expected to accelerate the removal of those shoals which have been produced by them, and if their closure be accompanied by the requisite contraction of the channel to a more nearly uniform high-water width, a lowering of the flood level may be expected to such extent as will ultimately render the maintenance of the levees as an aid to navigation practically needless above Red River, and greatly lessen the necessity of their permanent maintenance for that purpose below Red River, even at a reduced height.

While it is not claimed that levees in themselves are necessary as a means of securing ultimately a deep channel for navigation, it is believed that the repair and maintenance of the extensive lines already existing will hasten the work of channel improvement through the increased scour and depth of river-bed which they would produce during the highest river stages. They are regarded as a desirable, though not a necessary, adjunct in the general system of improvement submitted.

It is obvious that levees are, upon a large portion of the river, essential to prevent destruction to life and property by overflow. They give safety and ease to navigation and promote and facilitate commerce and trade by establishing banks or landing places above the reach of floods, upon which produce can be placed while awaiting shipment, and where steamboats and other river craft can land in times of high water.

In a restricted sense as auxiliary to a plan of channel improvement only, the construction and maintenance of a levee system is not demanded. But in a larger sense, as embracing not only beneficial effects upon the channel, but as a protection against destructive floods, a levee system is essential; and such system also promotes and facilitates commerce, trade, and the postal service.

A levee system aids and facilitates the postal service by protecting from injury and destruction by freshets and floods the various common roads and railways upon which that service is conducted to and from the river bank, and generally within that portion of the alluvial region subject to overflow. Moreover, the permanent maintenance below Cairo of a connected levee system, a system of sufficient strength to inspire confidence in its efficiency, or the demonstration, by the achieved results of an improved river, that overflow need no longer be seriously apprehended, would act as a prompt and powerful stimulant in rapidly developing a largely increased trade and commerce in all the products of agricultural industry indigenous to that region, and in those branches of manufacturing enterprise related thereto.

The foregoing is submitted as the opinions of this commission, with regard to the attributes and functions of levees, and their general utility and value. The views of the several members, however, are not in entire accord with respect to the degree of importance which should attach to the concentration of flood-waters by levees, as a factor in the plan of improvement of low-water navigation, which has received the unanimous preference of the commission.

The breaks in the levees were estimated in January, 1875, by the commission for the reclamation of the alluvial basin of the Mississippi River, to amount to 8,065,700 cubic yards. It is believed that the repairs done in Louisiana and Mississippi since that time will fully equal the enlargement of the openings in Arkansas and Missouri. The estimate of the cost of closing the breaks in the existing system of levees to the former height is based upon this hypothesis.

The want of completed surveys and the limited supply of labor would render difficult the construction of more than one-half of this amount of work in any one year.

Estimate of cost.

| For closing to their former height the gaps in the existing levees between Cairo and New Orleans, 8,065,700 cubic yards of earthwork, at 23 cents per yard | $1,855,111 |
| Total for repairs of existing levees | 2,020,000 |

This does not include the cost of maintenance, for which no reliable estimate can be made in the absence of data giving the required dimensions of the levees and their positions relative to caving banks. For the absolute prevention of destructive floods the former height of the levees would have to be increased, but no exact estimate of the cost of these higher levees can be made at present for want of the necessary data.

It will be seen that this report and estimate of probable cost is a literal compliance with the proviso of the act which directs the commission to report in full upon the practicability, possibility, and probable cost of the several plans mentioned.

The commission take them up and dispose of them seriatim. This levee system is taken up, reported upon, and its probable cost separately and distinctly stated not as a distinct plan for the improvement of the navigation of the Mississippi River, but as a levee system. True, its relation to, and value as a factor in the great plan of improvement adopted, is clearly shown and forcibly stated; but that is not the plan of improvement of the channel which is adopted and recommended. The plan recommended by the commission is as follows, and appears, as others, under a distinct heading. The language employed by the commission is:

PLAN OF IMPROVEMENT RECOMMENDED.

The bad navigation of the river is produced by the caving and erosion of its banks, and the excessive widths and the bars and shoals resulting directly therefrom.

It has been observed in the Mississippi River, and is indeed true of all silt-bearing streams flowing through alluvial deposits, that the more nearly the high river width, or width between the banks, approaches to uniformity, the more nearly uniform will be the channel depth, the less will be the variations of velocity, and the less the rate of caving to be expected in concave bends. This would seem to be so in the very nature of things, because uniformity of width secured by contraction will produce increased velocity, and therefore increased erosion of bed at the shoal places, accompanied by a corresponding deposit of silt at the deep places, and consequently greater uniformity of depth.

Uniform depth joined to uniform width, that is to say, uniformity of effective cross-section, implies uniform velocity, and this means that there will be no violent eddies and cross-currents, and no great and sudden fluctuations in the silt-transporting power of the current. There will therefore be less erosion from oblique currents and eddies, and no formations of shoals and bars produced by silt taken up from one part of the channel and dropped in another. As the friction of the bed retards the flow of the water, any diminution of the friction will promote the discharge of floods. The frictional surface is greater in proportion to volume of discharge where the river is wide and shoal than where it is narrow and deep. It follows, therefore, that after the wide-shoal places are suitably narrowed, and the normal sectional area is restored by deepening the channel, the friction will be less than it was before. This will result in a more easy and rapid discharge of the flowing water, and consequently in a lowering of the flood-surface. It would seem, therefore, that the plan of improvement must comprise, as its essential features, the contraction of the water-way of the river to a comparatively uniform width, and the protection of caving banks, and this is presumed to be the plan referred to in the act as the "jetty system." It is known, from observation of the river below Cairo, not only that shoals and bars, producing insufficient depth and bad navigation, are always accompanied by a low-water width exceeding three thousand feet, but that wherever the river does not exceed that width there is a good channel. In other words, bad navigation invariably accompanies a wide low-river water-way, and good navigation a narrow one.

The work to be done, therefore, is to scour out and maintain a channel through the shoals and bars existing in those portions of the river where the width is excessive, and to build up new banks and develop new shore-lines, so as to establish as far as practicable the requisite conditions of uniform velocity for all stages of the river.

It is believed that this improvement can be accomplished below Cairo by contracting the low-water channel-way to an approximately uniform width of about three thousand feet, for the purpose of scouring out a channel through the shoals and bars, and by causing, through the action of appropriate works constructed at suitable localities, the deposition of sand and other earthy materials transported by the water upon the dry bars and other portions of the present bed not embraced within the limits of the proposed low-water channel. The ultimate effect sought to be produced by such deposits is a comparative uniformity in the width of the high-water channel of the river.

It is believed that the works estimated for in this report will create and establish a depth of at least ten feet at extreme low stages of the river over all the bars below Cairo, where they are located.

It is the opinion of this commission that, as a general rule, the channel should be fixed and maintained in its present location, and that no attempt should be made to straighten the river or to shorten it by cut-offs.

The borings which were made in 1879 at New Madrid and Plum Point, by direction of the board of engineers for the improvement of the low-water navigation of the Mississippi River below Cairo, and those of more recent date at Memphis and Helena, made under the orders of this commission, as well as those near Lake Borgne, reported by the levee commission of 1875, and others made along the proposed line of the Fort Saint Philip Canal, and the artesian well sunk at New Orleans, all furnish concurrent evidence of the yielding character of the strata forming the river-bed. This evidence, taken in connection with the fact that deep water is found in all the bends of the river where the width is not excessive, and that these bends have, by their shiftings at one time or another, probably occupied and covered nearly every part of the belt from ten to twenty miles in width from Cairo to the Gulf, point to the conclusion, if it does not indeed justify it, that there is no extensive stratum of material capable of resisting erosion and preventing the river from deepening its own bed. In exceptional localities, where the material is too tough, or the gravel too heavy for removal by scour, dredging may have to be resorted to as an auxiliary, the depth secured by this means being maintained by the works erected for narrowing the stream.

Experience, as well in this country as in Europe, justifies the belief that the requisite correction and equalization of the transverse profile of the stream, by developing new shore lines and building up new banks, may be made chiefly through the instrumentalities of light, flexible, and comparatively inexpensive constructions of poles and brush, and materials of like character. These constructions will commonly be open or permeable to such a degree that, without too violently arresting the flow of water, thereby unduly increasing the head and causing dangerous underscour, they will sufficiently check the current to induce a deposit of silt in selected localities.

The works which have been used in similar improvements are of various forms and devices, such as the hurdle, composed of a line of stakes or light piles, with brush interlaced; the open dike, formed of stakes with waling strips on both sides filled in loosely with brush; the continuous brush mattress, built or woven on fixed or floating ways and launched as fast as completed as a revetment to a caving bank, the mattress used as a vertical or inclined curtain, placed in the stream to check the current, the same laid flat on the bottom as the foundation for such a curtain or as an anchorage for other brush devices; curtains of wire or brush netting, placed vertically or inclined in the stream; and various other forms of permeable brush dikes, jetties, or revetments. Some of these methods of construction have been used on the Mississippi and Missouri Rivers with increasing satisfaction and success, although they cannot yet be regarded as entirely beyond the experimental stage. In some, perhaps in many localities, works of a much more solid character than those above indicated may be necessary.

The closure of deep channels or low-water chutes, with a view of confining the flow to a single passage, may require substantial dams of brush and riprap stone or gravel, but it is believed the lighter and less costly works will generally suffice.

By a permeable dike located upon the new shore-line to be developed, connected with the old bank at suitable intervals by cross-lines of like character, or by jetties of hurdles or other permeable works projecting from the bank with their channel ends terminating on the margin of the proposed water way, or by any other equivalent works, the area to be reclaimed and raised will be converted into a series of silting basins, from which the water, flowing through the barriers with diminished velocity, will, after depositing its heavier material, pass off and give place to a new supply. In this manner the accretion will go on continuously through the high-water season, or through two or more seasons if necessary, the works being renewed on the higher level as occasion requires.

Wherever necessary, the new bank must be protected by a mattress, revetment, or some equivalent device.

That these methods of improvement are practicable is shown by the works already executed on the Mississippi and Missouri Rivers.

The plan submitted by the board of engineers for the improvement of the low-water navigation of the river below Cairo, in their report dated January 25, 1879, (see House Executive Document No. 41, Forty-fifth Congress, third session,) in which it is recommended that $600,000 be asked for the improvement of the Plum Point Reach, and "that the improvement be effected by narrowing the shoal and wide portions of the low-water river to about 3,500 feet, and by protecting caving banks where necessary," is substantially adopted for the initial works submitted for construction in this report.

An accurate estimate of the cost of properly improving the entire river below Cairo cannot be made until after the completion of the surveys now in progress. Moreover, estimates based upon the latest data from those surveys will doubtless require modification in some particulars to meet subsequent changes in the river, and will perhaps be considerably reduced in the aggregate amount by improved methods of construction developed during the progress of the work.

INITIAL WORKS.

Under the authority conferred in section 5 of the act, estimates of cost of certain initial works, constituting a component part of the general system of works contemplated, are submitted.

Those works of channel contraction and bank protection, which in the judgment of the commission may be advantageously undertaken during the coming fiscal year, or as soon as Congress supplies the means, are confined to an aggregate length of nearly two hundred miles of the shoalest water below Cairo, embracing the following localities, namely, New Madrid, Plum Point, Memphis, Helena, Choctaw Bend, and Lake Providence.

The estimates are intended to cover the cost of works for contracting the channel and for securing and protecting the banks; for the necessary outfit of boats, tugs, tools, &c., to carry on the work for local surveys, the salaries of engineers, superintendents, and inspectors, and the necessary office expenses. Further appropriations will be needed to complete the works, secure their permanence, and develop the full benefit of the system.

As regards the final cost, the novelty of the devices to be employed and the absence of experience with respect to the rapidity and degree of their results, forbid any exact estimate; but it is believed that such additional works as will ultimately be required to complete and render permanent the improvement contemplated in this system at the localities specified will not exceed the amount hereinbelow stated as needed for initial works.

It is considered necessary that a contingent sum, which is inserted in the estimates for initial work, be appropriated for use in any emergency that may arise for securing or protecting the works at any point after the specific appropriation may have been exhausted.

Estimates.

|---|---|
| New Madrid Reach, forty miles long: | |
| Works for contracting the channel and protecting the banks | $776,000 |
| For outfit, superintendence, inspection, office expenses, and local surveys | 147,000 |
| Total for New Madrid Reach | 923,000 |
| Plum Point Reach, thirty-eight miles long: | |
| Works for contracting the channel and protecting the banks | 599,000 |
| For outfit, superintendence, inspection, office expenses, and local surveys | 137,000 |
| Total for Plum Point Reach | 736,000 |
| Memphis Reach, sixteen miles long: | |
| Works for contracting the channel and protecting the banks | 282,000 |
| For outfit, superintendence, inspection, office expenses, and local surveys | 100,000 |
| Total for Memphis Reach | 382,000 |
| Helena Reach, thirty miles long: | |
| Works for contracting the channel and protecting the banks | 515,000 |
| For outfit, superintendence, inspection, office expenses, and local surveys | 112,000 |
| Total for Helena Reach | 627,000 |
| Choctaw Bend, thirty-five miles long: | |
| Works for contracting the channel and protecting the banks | 464,000 |
| For outfit, superintendence, inspection, office expenses, and surveys | 112,000 |
| Total for Choctaw Bend | 576,000 |
| Lake Providence Reach, twenty-five miles long: | |
| Works for contracting the channel and protecting the banks | 507,000 |
| For outfit, superintendence, inspection, office expenses, and local surveys | 112,000 |
| Total for Providence Reach | 619,000 |
| Contingencies | 250,000 |

Should it be determined not to appropriate the amounts estimated for all the initial works, it is considered important that the reduction should be made rather in the number of places at which work is proposed than by reducing the estimates for any one place.

Estimates for works of improvement for the first fiscal year.

| Initial works for channel contraction and bank protection | $4,113,000 |
| Closing gaps in levees | 1,010,000 |
| Checking enlargement of Atchafalaya | 10,000 |

Estimates for surveys and for expenses of commission for fiscal year ending June 30, 1881.

If Congress shall authorize any extensive works of improvement on the Mississippi, we would respectfully suggest that provision be made by law for the appropriation of such land and materials as may be needed in the work when the same cannot be obtained upon equitable terms by purchase from the owner. We do not contemplate that a resort to such proceedings would often be necessary, but in the absence of any such provision of law individual owners of the property required might greatly and unjustly enhance the cost of the work.

Authority to file in the proper court of the United States an article of appropriation describing the property to be taken, and to have an assessment by competent appraisers of its value, would tend to prevent extortion, and at the same time secure to the individual a just recompense for the property taken.

We venture to suggest further that, in case the commission should be continued in existence and the works recommended by it be in whole or in part authorized by Congress, the execution of the work and the expenditure of the appropriations therefor shall not be made part of the duty of the commission. We think the duties of the commission should be limited to the preparation of plans, their modification when necessary, the advisory supervision of the work, and the completion of the surveys and observations. This would secure unity of plan, greater efficiency in the work, and a better system of checks upon the expenditures than we could hope to secure if the entire work of devising, executing, and disbursing were cast upon the commission.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

Hon. ALEXANDER RAMSEY,
Secretary of War, Washington, D. C.

Here we have the "plan of improvement adopted." It admits of no doubt nor misconstruction; and, as all will readily see, it includes no levees for reclamation purposes. There is no occasion for the alarm and anxiety manifested. I make no doubt of the wisdom, judgment, and fidelity of the commission, nor do I doubt their full appreciation of the grave responsibilities put upon them by the law, and I shall not expect them to put other than a strict construction upon the acts under which they act. I do not believe they will use or sanction the use of any public moneys for any purpose except that for which it was appropriated. Why, then, shall we encumber the bill with amendments prohibiting that which is not intended nor contemplated? It would be equally as logical to put in an amendment providing that no money hereby appropriated shall be used for the construction of outlets, seeing that they are not included in the plan of improvement recommended and adopted.

The language of the paragraph of the bill under consideration is:

For the improvement of the Mississippi River, in accordance with the plan therefor adopted by the Mississippi River commission, to be expended by the Secretary of War, with the advice and under the supervision of said commission, the sum of $1,000,000. And it shall be the duty of said commission to take into consideration, and of the Secretary of War to extend operations, under their supervision to, tributaries of the Mississippi River to the extent, and no further, that may be necessary, in the judgment of said commission, to the perfection of the general and permanent improvement of said Mississippi River; but this clause shall not be construed to interfere with the prosecution by the War Department of the improvement of said Mississippi River and its tributaries under general appropriations made therefor.

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that nothing can be clearer, more conclusive and logical than all this. The commission have reported distinctly upon the specific plans indicated in the original act giving probable cost; and have distinctly adopted and recommended a plan or system of improvement, and that plan admits of no doubt. I exhort gentlemen to possess their souls in security and patience, and beg to assure them that we have no sinister designs upon the Treasury. Great caution and care has been observed by Congress in the progress of this proposed plan of improvement, much greater than that which has been observed in the improvement of any other river or harbor in the country. Ordinarily we are content to direct the Secretary of War to cause a survey of a stream to be made, and he causes an engineer officer to be detailed for that duty. Such officer makes a survey and reports a plan and estimates for the work, and an appropriation is made, and no questions asked. Such plans and estimates have been for more than twenty-five years submitted for various parts of the Mississippi River, but nothing of consequence has been done. This river has hitherto seemed to baffle the skill of the engineer, and, until now, none have been found bold enough to undertake the great work of controlling the mighty forces and permanently improving the navigation of this great river, upon which not only the commerce of this continent may float, but that of all the nations of the earth may also be borne in safety.

In abundance of caution Congress passed a law creating this great improvement commission, composed of the greatest military and civil engineers in the country, for the specific purpose of making a thorough study of this river and reporting plans and estimates for its improvement. That commission after one year reported the plan I have before stated.

It would seem that that elaborate and painstaking survey and examination would have been sufficient for Congress to act upon, and ordinarily Congress would have made the necessary appropriation without further ado. But it did not. This report was referred to the Committee on Levees and Improvements of the Mississippi River, accompanied with an order by resolution directing that committee or a sub-committee thereof to proceed down the Mississippi River to the head of the passes, in company with the commission, and make careful observation and examination of the proposed plan of improvement, and report thereon. That order was obeyed. A sub-committee of that committee was appointed to perform that duty, of which the distinguished gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON] was appointed chairman; but that gentleman being detained here by more urgent duties, I had the honor to go as chairman of that sub-committee in the performance of that important duty.

We were engaged during the entire month of May, 1880, in its performance, and I can assure the committee that we made a most thorough and painstaking examination, with most satisfactory results. That committee was thoroughly convinced of the practicability, feasibility, and economy of the proposed plan.

At the conclusion of that examination the committee made the following unanimous report:

The sub-committee of the Committee on Levees and Improvements of the Mississippi River, to whom was referred the report of the Mississippi River commission, and who, by the resolutions of the House of Representatives and of the Committee on Levees and Improvements of the Mississippi River, were directed "to proceed down the Mississippi River to its mouth, at such time as the committee may determine, for the purpose of acquiring a knowledge of its peculiar conditions and wants, and to gather information relative to the best methods for its improvement," &c., submitted the following report:

In obedience to said resolutions your sub-committee left Washington City on the 2d day of May, 1880, and proceeded direct to Saint Louis, Missouri, by railroad, arriving at said city on the evening of the 4th, from which point they proceeded to the mouth of the river.

On the 6th passage was taken on the steamer James Howard, from Saint Louis to New Orleans. This vessel has a beam of 55 feet, a length of 322 feet, and a registered tonnage of 2,321 tons. Her carrying capacity is about 3,000 tons on a draught of 11 feet. The displacement is about 1 foot for 450 tons. Her cargo aggregated about 3,100 tons in weight, and was composed as follows:

| Cargo, May 5, 1880. | Average weight. |
|---|---|
| 3,781 barrels flour | 216 |
| 2,422 barrels meal | 220 |
| 937 barrels pork | 330 |
| 53 barrels whisky | 375 |
| 50 barrels tallow | 400 |
| 66 barrels oil | 400 |
| 7,490 sacks corn | 165 |
| 6,593 sacks oats | 165 |
| 708 sacks bran | 180 |
| 1,007 bales hay | 300 |
| 854 bales cotton | 500 |
| 250 pieces bagging | 100 |
| 2,061 packages sundries. | |

This cargo was carried unbroken to Vicksburgh. Below that point it was distributed at about seventy landings, including towns, country stores, plantations, and farms. The trade seems to be direct between the producer and customer, and thus yields the largest benefit to both.

On starting, the river at Saint Louis was about half stage, or midway between high and low water. This condition indicated a depth of about sixteen feet more than the low-water channel, which may be assumed at four feet, (that prevails, disturbing navigation three or four months annually.) A channel of about twenty feet depth might, therefore, have been expected, affording unobstructed navigation even for the very large vessel on which we had embarked. But, in fact, frequent soundings were found necessary, which in many places showed a depth not exceeding twelve or fourteen feet.

Owing to the incessant shifting or changing of the channel, it was found necessary to tie up at night on the upper part of the river. This phenomenal condition is characteristic of parts of the stream where the width is excessive, or where it is divided into separate channels or chutes by bars or islands, and is explained by the principles enunciated and the processes described in the report of the Mississippi River commission.

Approaching Cairo, navigation was found better, on account of the back-water from the Ohio. The high-water prevailing on this stream filled the Mississippi nearly to danger-line from Cairo down. There was abundant evidence, however, that earlier in the season few, if any, points had escaped the general and disastrous overflow. Examinations of the river should be made during a great flood, and also at extreme low water. These conditions exhibit most clearly, and from different points of view, the necessity of "correcting, permanently locating and deepening the channel, and protecting the banks of the Mississippi River, improving and giving safety and ease to the navigation thereof, preventing destructive floods, and promoting and facilitating trade, commerce, and postal service."

A study of these conditions is therefore necessary for the proper consideration of and maturing a plan for accomplishment of these great objects.

Although your committee did not enjoy the advantages of observation afforded by either of these extreme conditions, they returned fully impressed with the importance and necessity of the proposed improvements, and with defined opinions concerning the character of the methods required for its attainment.

A sub-committee should visit the river during that part of the autumn when the lowest water may be expected, provided with sufficient appropriations to travel to such points and remain such time as a more thorough investigation may require.

The constant association of characteristic phenomena, wherever the navigation is very good or very bad, indicates clearly the relation of the cause and effect existing, and suggests the appropriate means of improvement.

Wherever the width of the river is unusually great, or where it is divided into separate channels, serious obstructions occur. Through a narrow and undivided bed deep water is always found. Inequalities of width are caused by the caving of the banks. As bars and islands are formed by this process they serve to intensify the original cause.

No natural cessation of the agencies now at work—destructive to navigation—can be anticipated.

We are of opinion that a process that will arrest the caving of the banks and will develop the bars outside the width of channel assumed as necessary into new shore lines, conserving and strengthening the scouring power of the current, instead of retarding, diverting, and dissipating it, as they do in their present condition, is eminently necessary not only for restoring the measure of navigation already lost, but to arrest the progress of deterioration which is steadily going on.

Your sub-committee have found that the parts of the levee system remaining range from about four to twenty feet high, comprising dikes attaining the height of thirty-five feet over bayous and sloughs. Where such dimensions are reached their maintenance is important in preventing the depletion of the river and the resulting injury to navigation through the outlets which their destruction would cause.

The present provision by the States in which these works are located for their preservation or restoration is inadequate and uncertain. It is also doubtful whether these States should be solely charged with these works, which, while they were built by them exclusively for protection from overflow, serve a national purpose in preventing destructive floods and in maintaining and improving by the removal of sand-bars the navigation of our inland waters.

In referring to this connection of levees with the navigation of the river, we quote from a board of engineers:

"The next obstacle to the improvement of the low-water navigation and to maintaining a levee system is one and the same for both, namely, the instability of the river from the caving of its banks. When this can be overcome by means not inordinately expensive (on which subject we have treated more fully in our preliminary report on the low-water navigation of the river) we may expect a deepened channel, a lowered high-water surface, and a stable river, the margins of which shall be securely cultivated to the enormous development of the wealth and population of the region."

From a careful comparison of our observations with the report of the Mississippi River commission, we are of opinion that the description and explanation contained therein of the natural operations now progressing to the detriment of the navigation of the Mississippi River are apparently correct; and, also, that the methods therein recommended for the treatment of the Mississippi River appear to be correct, and should be tested.

This is demanded both by the steady increase of the evils to be abated and by the trade of the Great Mississippi Valley seeking distribution and outlet.

Your committee forbear to enter upon any elaborate statement of facts showing the vast interests involved, preferring rather to confine themselves to the best means for benefiting and improving the navigation of the river in the interest of production, commerce, trade, and the general welfare.

All are familiar with the great resources of this mighty valley, embracing an area of about 2,000,000 square miles, with a population of near 30,000,000, and in 1879 producing 87 per cent. of the entire corn crop, 69 per cent. of the wheat, 72 per cent. of the rye, 75 per cent. of the tobacco, 74 per cent. of the cotton, 71 per cent. of the hog crop, and almost the total sugar crop of the country, which, less the cost of transporting, represents the immense productive powers of the valley. Carefully gathered statistics also show that the manufacturing and mining interests and capabilities of this region will soon equal, if they do not surpass, the older communities in other parts of the country.

It has been well said that "manufacturers run along the lines of least resistance;" and, with the abundant supply of raw material, with food and land cheap and plentiful, the Mississippi Valley is destined to develop upon as grand a scale in this direction as it has already done in the line of agriculture.

The foregoing statements give some conception of the territory, population, products, commerce, and manufactures affected, in a local sense, by the proposed improvements. But we may here repeat, with emphasis, what was said by a member of the House when the subject of this river and valley was before it:

"The magnitude of the interests involved may properly be held to concern the whole country, and if the 'general welfare' clause of the Constitution can be invoked at all, surely it would apply here. Indeed, we may go further and, adopting the language of the memorial of the late Quincy improvement convention addressed to Congress, fairly say 'that the subject presented for your consideration is, in its full bearing, not confined to the interesting region for the needs of which we speak, nor yet to the whole country, which you represent. It is lifted to a higher plane; becomes international in its character; and is, in a large degree, of interest to the whole civilized world.'"

Permanent resuscitation and maintenance of all commercial and business industries must come from the soil. The question for solution is not how much can we produce, but how much can we sell?

The vital point of the whole matter is found in the proposition that the interest and value of this immense product and commerce are dependent upon the methods by which the markets of consumption can be most cheaply reached:

"At the foundation of this inquiry," say the memorialists above referred to, "lie three propositions, so clear that they may be regarded as commercial axioms.

"These are—

"First. The price obtained for the surplus fixes the value of the whole production—as the home market generally rules at the prices of the foreign—less the cost of transfer. Thus the saving to the people of the valley who till the soil of one cent per bushel on wheat and corn for the year 1879 would, according to the figures of production, aggregate a sum total of nearly $15,000,000."

It is not unreasonable to estimate that the deepening of the channel of the Mississippi River will lessen the freight, carriage, and insurance rates of the cereals alone to the seaboard at least five cents per bushel, which gives in round numbers $75,000,000 per annum on the present yield.

"Second. The rate by river determines the rate by rail. But we are confronted here by the difficulty that there is a limit to railway capacity. * * * The improvement of the water-ways is as necessary to bear away our enormous and constantly increasing surplus of productions as it is to regulate the rates at which products shall be moved.

"Third. The deeper the channel, the larger the vessel employed; the greater the capacity of the vessel, the less the cost of carriage, is the law of water-freights. Thus cheap transportation is the basal thought of all that can be planned or accomplished. It is the vital and paramount, as it is, throughout the country, the all absorbing and overshadowing question."

In conclusion, adopting the eloquent language of a distinguished member of this House, your committee asks, the whole country asks:

"Why should you not improve the Mississippi River? It belongs to no State; it cannot be monopolized; it is beyond the reach of corporations; it is the nation's free highway; it is the national outlet of a mighty valley, fifteen hundred miles wide and two thousand miles long, the richest and largest in the world, penetrated by fifty thousand miles of boatable streams; it affords the cheapest navigation known, furnishing itself propelling power. A single steam-tug with barges will bring down more wheat than can be moved on fifteen hundred freight cars, and at half the cost."

We are spending between three and four millions of dollars per year, wisely as we think, to improve the tributaries of the Mississippi River, and should improve the Father of Waters itself, this great trunk-line, this central highway of commerce, so that it shall not remain blocked up or be permitted to convert itself into a shallow waste, useless and dangerous.

P. DUNN,
W. R. MYERS,
B. W. HARRIS,
C. D. PRESCOTT,
H. L. HUMPHREY,
Committee.

This report was made to the last session of this Congress, and now at length, after two years of careful study, surveying and examination we are about to institute the initial works. Great and unusual caution has been observed at every step of this scheme. It seems to me that all should feel safe in voting this small appropriation—one-fifth of the sum asked for by the commission. I would rather vote five millions than one, for I feel confident it will be a great success and of inestimable value to the whole country. I feel deeply and earnestly interested in this great work, and hope it will not be handicapped with unnecessary amendments.

Let the commission go forward with their plan. They will not misapply the money.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will it be agreeable to the gentleman to be interrupted at this point?

Mr. DUNN. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON. If the gentleman will turn to page 19 of the report of the commission he will find "estimates for works of improvement for the first fiscal year." And in those estimates he will find this item: "Closing gaps in levees, $1,010,000."

Mr. DUNN. That is in accordance with the original act which I have read, and which directs the commission to report upon these separate plans and to state the probable cost.

Mr. ROBINSON. Are you in favor of expending this money to protect the alluvial lands?

Mr. DUNN. I am not in favor of expending one dollar of this money for that purpose exclusively.

Mr. ROBINSON. Then why object to my amendment which makes plain that it shall not be so expended.

Mr. DUNN. I am in favor of the jetty plan of improving the navigation of the Mississippi River, because I believe it will reduce the high-water level of the river's surface on that river, as it has succeeded on the Rhine. This same plan has reduced the high-water level of the Rhine by many feet in a short time.

I beg leave to call attention to a brief extract from a discourse on the Rhine before and after the regulations of its course from the French-Bavarian frontier to Germersheim, by Henry Grebenau, royal inspector of public buildings at Germersheim, September 11, 1869.

This distinguished engineer, in commenting upon the work of the Rhine commission, a body similar to our Mississippi River commission, says:

If one observes a river for a long time, the following phenomena may present themselves:

First. Falling and rising of the river, to be observed two or three times a day on the water-marks at different stations, and the laws to be derived from such observations during a certain number of years.

Second. The different breadth and depth at different stations.

Third. The fall and its gradual decrease from the mountains where the river rises to the sea.

Fourth. The velocity of the water resulting therefrom, not only in the so-called valley road, but also on the other parts of the cross-cut, and the law of the distribution of this velocity over the whole cross-cut.

Fifth. The amount and kind of deposit, and the law of the movement of the rubble, (gravel and sand masses which the river carries on its bed.)

Sixth. The carrying of mud or the quantity of those dissolved or suspended earthy parts carried by the river during inundations or high water, and which form fertile deposits on both sides of its banks.

Seventh. The temperature of the water at different seasons and in proportion to the temperature of the air.

Eighth. The formation of ice obstructions and their bad results, the more so if, at the same time, inundations set in.

To reduce from these observations the rules for the correction of river courses is the province of the hydrologist.

Almost every river takes its origin from a former lake basin. River valleys are bordered by parallel mountain chains but for certain distances; all at once the river breaks through across the mountains. For instance, the Danube, after running for a good while through lowlands, breaks near Weltenberg, above Ratisbonne, through a small jurassic spur, and between Passau and Linz mostly through gneiss; the same between Linz and Vienna, and near Theben and Gran again through the mountains. All these breakings through correspond with as many flowings off from former lake basins. The same with the Rhine; and quite similar circumstances have lately been pointed out on the Mississippi by the American engineer officers, Humphreys and Abbot. In close connection with the history of the former Rhine basin, is the formation of the so-called Rhine high banks, between Lauterburg and Mannheim, on both sides of the river. (See map, table 1.) This high bank belonging to the diluvial period is, almost at all points, of the same height, or upon an average, thirty feet over the so-called low ground of the Rhine, and consists entirely of extremely fertile clay soil mixed with sand, while the low ground of the Rhine, that is to say, the former Rhine bed, belongs to the alluvial period, and is generally covered with a fertile clay stratum of but from six to eight feet high; under this fertile couch to a depth of fifty feet and more it consists entirely over the whole breadth of gravel. This high bank or diluvial terrace shows quite peculiar contours, which at the first glance greatly surprise the hydrologist, and which remind him of events which happen on rivers left to themselves to this day in carrying rubble. The contour of this diluvial terrace forms a repeated crossing of circular curves, showing at some places quite distinctly, and which cannot be accidental, but which on account of their constant repetition, are to be attributed to a constantly acting cause. (See map, table 1.)

The immense masses of gravel on the bottom of the Rhine basin between the now existing diluvial terraces must be looked at as the principal cause of transforming the last rest of the lake into a serpentine and gravel-carrying river. In observing the farther law of the movement of water in rivers carrying gravel, viz, that in one and the same cross-cut the greater velocity corresponds with the greater depth, and vice versa, it becomes evident that when a mountain projecting from the right bank obstructed the river, causing it to turn to the left, the signal was given to the serpentine formation in the old lake basin; and that, further, where the water-masses were collected together, thereby producing a greater depth, also was caused a greater velocity on the bottom of the river, or, in other words, the formation of a serpentine river channel. The lowlands owe their fertility to the inundations of the Rhine before its regulation. The mean annual flowing-through quantity of the Rhine at Germersheim is about 37,162,000 cubic meters, or about one-fifteenth of that of the Mississippi.

From 1817 to 1825 six contractions were executed between the French frontier and Germersheim. They resulted in a shortening of two and five-eighths hours of the river course, and in 1828 an exceedingly salutary sinking of the water-surface was observed to the amount of five feet. The normal breadth between both the banks was fixed at two hundred and forty meters. In 1868 eighteen contractions in all were accomplished. The principal results of these works were the following: The river had been canalized, partly in straight lines, partly in soft windings, between parallel and stone-paved banks two hundred and forty meters from each other. The former length of thirty-one hours from Luterburg to Worms was reduced to eighteen, or shortened thirteen, this being a great gain for navigation. The fall of the water-surface having formerly been echelon, like in the serpentine river, and alternately greater or less, so that the vessels to be drawn up the river wanted sometimes one and sometimes five horses, is now quite uniform, decreasing from four-tenths per millimeter at Lanterburg to one-tenth per millimeter at Worms. This requires but one and the same drawing force for the whole way. The fall of the water-surface of the Rhine amounts to two and twenty-five hundredths meters, and all the spots exposed to inundations before 1817 continue now to remain dry. Ninety-two hundred and twenty-five acres of land were thus gained and adapted to culture. Finally, the profitableness of the correction of the Rhine consists in the quicker carrying off of the high water, and the rarer happening of ice obstructions on account of the straight course, and also it reanimated navigation, and consequently contributed to the prosperity of the inhabitants.

Mr. GIBSON. Will the gentleman allow me a moment?

Mr. DUNN. Certainly.

Mr. GIBSON. I understand the gentleman does not differ at all with the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ROBINSON,] but he regards the amendment offered by that gentleman as superfluous.

Mr. DUNN. That is all.

Mr. GIBSON. Then why not accept it? We gentlemen who have endeavored to attend to this interest know perfectly well that every word is true which the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DUNN] has said; but there are apprehensions in the minds of many gentlemen on this floor that this commission will build levees or dikes in the interest of riparian owners of land on the banks of the Mississippi River.

Now, those gentlemen who represent that portion of the country disavow any such purpose, and we declare that the report of the commission proposes no such plan. The gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ROBINSON,] who has given attention to this matter, brings in here an amendment to prohibit the commission from doing what, in the opinion of the gentleman from Arkanas, [Mr. DUNN,] it does not propose to do; that is, to build levees for the purpose of protecting lands from overflow. Now I hope the amendment will be adopted by the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DUNN] has expired.

Mr. DUNN. Allow me to say in conclusion——

Mr. MARSH. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. DUNN. I simply desire to say that I will not oppose the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ROBINSON;] but I wanted to show that, in my judgment, it was not necessary.

Mr. MARSH. I am opposed to this particular appropriation, because I believe it is in the interest of building up the broken down levees from Cairo to New Orleans. I take it that if gentlemen will look into the law which authorizes and creates this commission, and which my friend from Arkansas [Mr. DUNN] has cited to the House, and will look at the report made by the commission, which report embodies the plan that is referred to in this bill——

Mr. BUCKNER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MARSH. I have not time in my five minutes; I would be glad to do so if I had time.

Every gentleman must be convinced that one of the objects of this appropriation is to fill up the gaps in these broken down levees. In the plan proposed $2,020,000 is estimated as necessary simply to fill the gaps; and an appropriation of $1,010,000 is asked for this purpose for the first year; and this bill proposes to give within $10,000 of the amount asked.

Now, as to the amendment offered by my friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. ROBINSON.] I am not surprised that the gentleman from Mississippi and other gentlemen on this floor who live down in that region and are advocates of this clause readily accept the proposition offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts, because under it, if the commission that is to control the expenditure of this money—not the Secretary of War, as was intimated by the gentleman from Massachusetts—thinks it best to use the money for the building up of these levees, then under the provisions of the gentleman's amendment that commission will have the right to do so.

The amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts still leaves with these commissioners the power to do that which they say in their report ought to be done, because they say that in order to improve the navigation of the river the building of these levees is an incidental adjunct; and where is the safeguard against their expending this million of dollars for the incidental adjunct rather than for the main purpose of deepening the channel of the river?

I wish to say to gentlemen who are opposed to this levee system of the Lower Mississippi River that the amendment offered by my friend from Massachusetts—offered no doubt in perfect good faith—is but a blind, and a cover beneath which the original design can and will be accomplished, notwithstanding the pretense that that design is prevented by the amendment. I am not surprised that gentlemen favoring this measure so readily accept the amendment.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Chairman, I rise for the purpose of opposing the substitute offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ROBINSON,] and also to accept the suggestion made by him in his remarks in reference to the amendment offered by myself. The gentleman's substitute provides that the commission may use this money in repairing breaks in the levees or banks—I do not pretend to quote the language exactly—when in their opinion the navigation of the river or the depth of the channel will be improved by such expenditure. Every gentleman who lives in the valley of the Mississippi knows that the channel of that river is never deepened when it is sufficiently high to break over the levees and banks. Scientific investigation has shown that during high water the bottom of the river is filled up by deposits continually, and that the channel is only washed out and deepened when the river is low. The channel of the river cannot be deepened during high water, or its conditions benefited by applying this money to repair the breaks in the levees. It seems to me that there is a gap in the gentleman's amendment sufficiently large, not only for the million of dollars, but for the whole Mississippi River to run through.

Now, my proposition is a plain, square test question. There is no surplusage in it. It presents directly the question whether this $1,000,000 is to be used in reclaiming the swamp, overflowed, and alluvial lands, by the building of levees or the repair of breaks in the levees and banks of the Mississippi, or whether it is to be used in deepening the channel, and thereby improving the navigation of the river. It has been suggested that the word "navigation" is a dangerous one. Upon reflection I see that it may be, and therefore I ask leave to modify my amendment by striking out "and thereby the navigation."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has a right without leave to modify his amendment.

Mr. THOMAS. Then I will modify the amendment so as to read as follows:

Provided, That no part of said sum shall be expended for the purpose of reclaiming the swamp, overflowed, or alluvial lands alongside the Mississippi River, but shall be confined strictly to improving the channel of said river.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will my friend give me his attention for a moment? He is clear in the use of language; but does he not see that if he talks about a great "gap" in anybody's amendment, there is a tremendous one in his own? His amendment provides that this appropriation shall not be used for reclaiming swamp and overflowed lands, but shall be used for the purpose of deepening and improving the channel. My friend will see that while the commission under his own amendment will not build levees to reclaim swamp and overflowed lands, they will, if their judgment so directs, repair the levees to improve and deepen the channel. That is what the gentleman wants to do, just as I do; and that is the effect of my amendment.

Mr. THOMAS. That is exactly what I want them to do.

Mr. WARNER addressed the House. [See Appendix.]

Mr. REAGAN. I hope we will rise and go into the House to close debate.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I have an amendment to offer. It is proposed to strike out of the substitute all after the word "levees," so it will read:

Provided, That no portion of the sum hereby appropriated shall be used in the repair or construction of levees.

Mr. Chairman, we either want to prevent the building of levees with this money, or we do not. If we wish to prevent it, we might as well say so in the bill, and not leave it as a matter of opinion.

According to the substitute, if the engineer builds a levee, although it may have operated to protect the land of the gentleman, it will be enough for him to say that he did it for the purpose of navigation, and then it is all right.

Now, this Mississippi River commission say that levees have never been erected on the banks of the Mississippi River except for the special purpose of protecting the alluvial lands from overflow. They also say, and they say theoretically, a levee might possibly help navigation. Here is what they say about it:

The immediate effect of the levees would be to increase the volume and height and accelerate the velocity of the flood-waters between them, resulting in an erosion and deepening of the river-bed, and ultimately in a corresponding lowering of the flood-slope in accordance with the general law already quoted, that an increase in the normal volume of discharge in a sedimentary stream flowing through alluvial deposits results ultimately in a lowering of the flood-surface.

Now, the minority of the committee say that is not so, and I ask the Clerk to read the portion I have marked.

The Clerk read as follows:

2. We do not concur with the majority of the commission in their estimate of the value of the closure of gaps in existing levees as a factor in the improvement of low-water navigation; this estimate being derived in part from the theoretical views already referred to.

Existing evidence seems to show that during low-water stages the bars below Cairo are usually cut out by the river, and that when the period of low river in the following season approaches these low-water channels are found filled up, the low-water bed of the river in these shoal places having risen, to be again cut out by the low river. (See Major Suter's report in Report of Chief of Engineers, 1875.)

At the Horse Tail Bar, below Saint Louis, the bed of the river has been observed to rise eight or ten feet above low-water in the interval between two low-river periods. (See General Simpson's report in Chief of Engineer's Report, 1876.)

If, then, the final effect of a flood which rises from thirty to fifty feet above low-water is to raise the low-water bed of the river at shoal places, may it not be possible that if the height of this flood be somewhat increased by levees the bed may rise still further instead of being depressed, thus injuring instead of improving navigation.

But even if a rise or fall of a foot or two in the bed of the river were produced by levees, it is difficult to see how this would sensibly affect the low-water width of the river. Bad navigation arises from excessive low-water width at certain places, and is to be cured by contracting that low-water width to about three thousand feet. This contraction must be effected by works in the bed of the river, and not by levees on top of its banks, out of contact with the low-water river.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. When experts differ in so important a matter as that, it seems to me we do not want to invest a million dollars in the experiment.

Mr. HASKELL. I rise to oppose the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York, and I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts will prevail. I desire to say but a word or two on this Mississippi River plan. I have personal knowledge for over twenty years of the intense desire of the shipping interests of Saint Louis and other cities on that river to have it improved, and I know it is the wish of the people in that valley to have it improved, and I have no doubt there may be attached to the improvement of the river interests of planters here and there which would be protected by a levee; but this is not the main object in all honesty and truth of this movement for the improvement of the river. There is, Mr. Chairman, a desire to have the river improved. This is but the culmination of attempts made twenty years ago to begin the work. I believe that the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts sufficiently guards it. I think we can well afford standing on the threshold of an improvement that will cost millions of dollars to trust under these guards and restrictions the operations of this board for one year at least. Then they are to make a report. They are then to come to Congress for the continuation of this work. No one expects it to be completed by this appropriation.

I desire to say here that, for one, I shall not object if in the method adopted for the improvement of that river a single planter on the Mississippi River shall obtain some benefit if the grand work of improving the channel is accomplished. I say God speed the planter who gets a small advantage from the great work of the Federal Government in the main line of improving the river. I think this is about the best and cheapest provision incorporated in this whole bill, and I hope the committee will not be prejudiced nor blinded, or get mad over the consideration of a bill like this, and really shut their eyes to the benefits to be derived from the deepening of the channel on that magnificent river—benefits which will extend to every portion of the common country.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say a word in regard to the amendment to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York in regard to the repairs of the levees of the Mississippi River. No one acquainted with the facts in connection with this matter can contend for a moment that in some cases it may not be necessary that the levees of the river shall be utilized for the purpose of this improvement. The plan adopted by the commission sent there to examine into and report upon that river is not to use the levees, but to adopt a system which is in use in many rivers in Europe of improving it by revetments, and any one who knows anything of alluvial streams knows that by sinking these wire mattresses or brush along the banks below the bed of the stream, a corresponding wash is made in the channel which entirely sweeps away the collecting débris and other matter, and eventually secures a depth of water that could not otherwise be obtained, so that by the scouring process the channel may be deepened so as to do away entirely with the levee system. If it should happen eventually that the improvement of this river should reclaim lands belonging to private individuals, surely no complaint of wrong could be entered against a beneficial system by reason of that fact. The plan of the commission is to so deepen the channel by the revetment system, which has proved so satisfactory on alluvial rivers in Europe and elsewhere, and by using these sunken mattresses, wires, or brush so as to lower eventually the banks of the river to their natural level, in place of allowing the river to run, as it does now, on the top of a ridge or causeway for hundreds of miles, and at the same time increase the depth to a uniform figure of ten feet by the scouring process, so that at all seasons of the year there may be sufficient depth for vessels drawing seven or eight feet of water. When we went to New Orleans in the spring upon the steamer James Howard she had on her decks 3,150 tons of freight, equal in amount to thirteen trains of thirty cars each. If the plan which the commission have adopted and by which they propose to take and expend a million of dollars was practically successful, the result will be that the commerce on that river will swell to such magnitude that it will pay the whole cost of the improvement, even if it costs $50,000,000 by its reduction in transportation of the products of the country, and the people of this whole country will be richer by $500,000,000 in the next twenty years. [Applause.]

Mr. REAGAN. I now move that the committee rise.

Mr. MARSH. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to this paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion to rise has precedence.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. BLACKBURN, as Speaker pro tempore, having taken the chair, Mr. CARLISLE reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the river and harbor appropriation bill, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

ORDER OF ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. CARLISLE. Mr. Speaker, in order to avoid a conflict between the legislative day and the calendar day, I move that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Thursday next at eleven o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. FINLEY. I desire to ask unanimous consent to print some remarks in the RECORD in reference to the tariff.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly. [See Appendix.]

Permission to print remarks in the RECORD on the river and harbor bill was given to Mr. ACKLEN, Mr. KING, Mr. TOWNSHEND of Illinois, Mr. BERRY, and Mr. THOMAS TURNER. [See Appendix.]

Mr. CONGER. I ask consent, Mr. Chairman, to add to the remarks I made this morning some quotations from one or two other sources.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. BROWNE. Mr. Speaker, I move that everybody have leave to print who desires it on the pending bill.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. REAGAN. I move that the House now resolve itself in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to consider the river and harbor appropriation bill; and pending that motion I move that all debate on the pending paragraph and amendments thereto be limited to one minute.

Mr. MARSH. If this amendment prevails I desire to ask the chairman whether the limitation on the debate will apply to subsequent amendments which are not now pending?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It will apply to all amendments to the pending paragraph.

Mr. MARSH. I desire to offer an amendment to the paragraph myself.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If the motion shall prevail it does not prevent the offering of any additional amendments to the pending paragraph, but it limits debate upon all amendments to one minute.

Mr. MARSH. I wish to ask the gentleman in charge of this bill if he will not make the limitation of debate ten minutes instead of one minute, and allow me a portion of the time, as I desire to offer some amendments? This is an important provision and ought not to be acted upon hastily.

Mr. REAGAN. I will modify my amendment and make it five minutes, which time I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois if he so desires.

The motion to limit debate was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now recurs on the motion of the gentleman from Texas that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to proceed to the consideration of the river and harbor appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. CARLISLE in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole to consider the river and harbor appropriation bill. By order of the House all debate upon the pending paragraph and all amendments thereto is limited to five minutes.

Mr. MARSH. I rise to ask whether it is now in order to offer an amendment to the text of this paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not at this time. But the Chair will recognize the gentleman at this time to speak to his own amendment, if he desires to do so; or he can reserve his five minutes till he offers the amendment.

Mr. MARSH. I will reserve my time till I offer my amendment.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. VAN VOORHIS to the substitute of Mr. ROBINSON, it was not agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on agreeing to the substitute proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROBINSON] for the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. THOMAS.] They will be again read.

The amendment and substitute were again read.

The question being taken, the substitute was adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

Mr. GIBSON. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GIBSON. If we vote "ay" do we adopt the substitute offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ROBINSON?]

The CHAIRMAN. The committee has agreed to the substitute of the gentleman from Massachusetts in lieu of the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, and it has now become the only amendment pending to the section. Those who vote "ay," vote for the adoption of the substitute.

The question being taken, the amendment, as amended by the adoption of the substitute, was agreed to.

Mr. MARSH. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 350, after the word "river," insert "from Saint Paul to New Orleans;" in line 352, after "commission," insert "for the improvement below Cairo;" and in line 353 strike out the words "with the advice and under the supervision of said commission;" so that that portion of the paragraph will read as follows:

"For the improvement of the Mississippi River from Saint Paul to New Orleans in accordance with the plan therefor adopted by the Mississippi River commission for the improvement below Cairo, to be expended by the Secretary of War, the sum of $1,000,000."

Mr. MARSH. Now, Mr. Chairman, if the American Congress are prepared to make a new departure and appropriate the public money for the purpose of building up levees in this country, I see no reason why these appropriations should be confined to the States south of Cairo; and hence my first amendment is to extend that system up to Saint Paul; because between Cairo and Saint Paul there are more acres of overflowed lands, rich alluvial soil, than there are below. If the money is to be taken out of the Treasury for these purposes do not let that money be used for a sectional purpose. Do not give encouragement to the cry which has prevailed in a certain section of the country for years past, "the old flag and an appropriation." Do not cut this Mississippi River in two at Cairo and give the appropriation to the South and not give it to the North. So much for the first part of my amendment.

I come now to the next part of my amendment. The bill says this money is to be expended by the Secretary of War. But how expended by him? It is to be expended by him "with the advice and under the supervision of said commission." This commission, Mr. Chairman, in my opinion, is not the body under which $1,000,000 of the public money should be expended. That commission was not organized for the purpose of expending money or directing its expenditure. Congress authorized the creation of that commission and it was appointed solely for the purpose of examining the Mississippi River below Cairo and offering such suggestions as to the improvement of the navigation there as seemed best to them. Now it is attempted by this bill to clothe the commission with the control and expenditure of this money, but my amendment proposes to strike that out so that the money, this $1,000,000 of money, will be expended by the Secretary of War as every other dollar of money that has been authorized by Congress in years past for the improvement of rivers and harbors has had to be expended. Why make an exception of these levees? Why take this levee system out from the control of the Secretary of War and place it in the hands of a commission that never was appointed for that purpose but for an entirely different purpose?

The question on the amendment offered by Mr. MARSH having been taken viva voce, the chairman [Mr. SPRINGER] said that in the opinion of the Chair the "noes" had it.

Mr. MARSH. I call for a division. I want to know who are in favor of levees in the South and who are against levees up North.

The committee again divided; and there were—ayes 26, noes 87.

Mr. MARSH. No quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. A quorum not having voted, the Chair will order tellers; and appoints the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. MARSH, and the gentleman from Texas, Mr. REAGAN.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 37, noes 120.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. ROBINSON. There is a verbal amendment necessary in line 351. I move to strike out the word "adopted" and insert in lieu thereof "recommended in Executive Document No. 58, second session Forty-sixth Congress."

Mr. KENNA. There is no objection to that.

The amendment offered by Mr. ROBINSON was adopted.

Mr. COX. I wish to have printed in the RECORD a letter pertinent to this bill.

There was no objection.

The letter is as follows:

LANCASTER, February 12, 1881.

SIR: Recognizing the soundness of your position on the harbor bill, and supposing that you will favor truly meritorious national improvements, I want to tell you that some sly people in Minneapolis and Saint Paul who wish to force the products of Northern Dakota and Northern Minnesota around through their towns, and to go to Chicago on the way to the eastern markets, have got into the harbor bill a large sum for a system of reservoirs at the headwaters of the Mississippi, under the pretense of improving the navigation of the Upper Mississippi above Saint Louis, while really the project is simply to improve the water-power at the Falls of Saint Anthony, which lacks water in the late summer season.

That is all there is of it. You will see the water-shed at the headwaters of the Mississippi is very limited; the river area below, down to Saint Louis, is not far from one thousand square miles. At times there is but a foot of water at Saint Paul. All the water that could be stored up would not keep up navigation a week.

What is wanted for the wonderful region of the Red River Valley is a slack-water and canal connection of the Lake Superior with the Red River, a feasible project fraught with vast advantages to our northwestern country, (and to New York.)

This project is not favored by Saint Paul, Minneapolis, or the southern portion of the State; they prefer to send the products of the northern portion of the State through Chicago, though it is just as far from that place to Buffalo as it is from Duluth, 1,000 miles in each case.

You would do these people of the great Northwest a favor to have twenty or thirty thousand dollars put into the harbor bill for this survey, and this reservoir item taken out, as it is antagonistic to a really national work.

Mr. Charles Ellet years ago projected a system of reservoirs at the headwaters of the Ohio; they cover a vast water-shed in several States; but the idea was generally thought to be impracticable, and given up after much discussion.

The water route is as 15 or 20 to 1 for economy in competition with railroad carriage. If we intend to hold our grain trade with Europe we must have cheap freights. It costs two cents a bushel to bring a bushel of wheat from the West 1,000 miles in a steamer, a price which would only pay for its carriage sixty-six miles on a railroad at one cent per ton per mile.

JAMES M. PERRY.

Hon. S. S. COX, Member of Congress, &c.

The Clerk read the following:

Improving Broad Creek from its mouth to Laurel, Delaware, $10,000.

Mr. SIMONTON. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk to come in as an independent clause preceding the clause last read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The engineers having in charge the improvements appropriated for in this bill shall report what effect the expenditures and improvements theretofore may have had upon the convenience, increase, or diminution of commerce, local and general, relating to said improvements; and the Secretary of War shall transmit the same to Congress with his annual estimates for the improvement of rivers and harbors.

Mr. SIMONTON addressed the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN, (Mr. SPRINGER.) The Chair is of opinion this relates to the paragraph on which debate has been closed.

Mr. SIMONTON. I beg the Chair's pardon. I intend that to come in as a separate paragraph after the paragraph on which debate was limited and before the succeeding one.

The CHAIRMAN. But it is nevertheless an amendment to a clause upon which debate has been limited.

Mr. SIMONTON. It relates to the whole bill, and not to the preceding clause.

The CHAIRMAN. It is in order to move the amendment; but the Chair is of the opinion that limiting debate upon a clause also limits debate upon all amendments and propositions relating to that clause.

Mr. SIMONTON. My purpose is not to amend the clause we have just left, but to insert as a new paragraph by itself a provision relating to the whole bill.

Mr. KENNA. Will the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMONTON] allow me to call his attention to a provision of this bill?

Mr. SIMONTON. I will do so.

Mr. KENNA. The last clause in the bill is as follows:

And in every case where examinations or surveys are made, the report thereon shall embrace such information concerning the commercial importance, present and prospective, of the improvement contemplated thereby, and such general commercial statistics as the Secretary of War may be able to procure.

Mr. SIMONTON. I will withdraw my amendment until that portion of the bill has been reached.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is withdrawn; and the Clerk will proceed with the reading of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

For improving Choptank River between Denton and Greensborough, Maryland, $5,000.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. I move to strike out the paragraph just read. I desire only to read a sentence or two from the report of an "injudicious friend" of this bill; otherwise called the Engineer. He says:

This is rather a tidal estuary than a river, in a proper sense. The distance from Denton to Greensborough by the river is nearly eight miles.

In another place in this bill there is an appropriation for "improving Threadhaven Creek." In regard to that the Engineer says:

With respect to the Threadhaven, the commercial importance of Easton, for the benefit of which Threadhaven Creek has to be improved, is such as to hold the key of the entire Choptank trade.

Now, I submit to the House that either the Choptank or the Threadhaven improvement could be dispensed with. If the Threadhaven holds the key to the Choptank trade, then what in the name of Heaven is the use of improving the Choptank? That is all I have to say on this amendment.

The motion to strike out was not agreed to.

The Clerk read the following:

Improving Elk River, Maryland, $5,000.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. I move to strike out that item. Another "injudicious friend" heard from. [Laughter.] He says:

At the same time it was recommended that if any appropriation were made it be not less than $20,000, as to carry the work through with successive small appropriations would increase very much the cost.

Now, as this river is of no earthly importance except to a little circle of fisherman down there, I suggest that this item be stricken out entirely, until such time as the greater amount of the national debt is paid, when we can appropriate the whole $20,000 and do up the business at once in an economical manner, if it is thought best at the time to do so.

The motion to strike out was not agreed to.

The Clerk read the following:

Improving Secretary Creek, Maryland, $3,000.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. I move to strike out that item. Here is another locality that wants "the golden stream" to flow into it from the Federal Treasury. And another "injudicious friend" is heard from:

The whole length is not much over three miles, entirely in Dorcester County. The rise of the tide one and one-half feet: the volume of the stream depending mainly upon the tide. This creek is the water outlet of the trade of the town of East Newmarket and the surrounding territory, which is very fertile and thickly settled, about eighty miles square.

I think I have read something about this before. ["Vote!" "Vote!"] I am through.

The motion to strike out was not agreed to.

The Clerk read the following:

Improving Threadhaven Creek for three miles below Easton, Maryland, $3,000.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. I move to strike out this item. The Engineer says that the name of this creek is not known. [Laughter.] He calls it "Threadhaven," as the best he can find. The only reason why an appropriation should be made for this improvement, that I can see, is the following:

Third Haven (not Threadhaven) Creek is an important tributary of the Choptank, and it holds the key to the Choptank trade.

Now, having improved the Choptank, what is the use of improving the key? I move that it be stricken out.

The motion was not agreed to.

The Clerk read the following:

Improving Wicomico River below Salisbury, Maryland: Completing improvement, $2,000.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. I move to strike out that paragraph. Another "injudicious friend" heard from. The "injudicious friend" says:

Some dikes also are to be built for the construction of a water-way, and as a place behind which to deposit material dredged from the channel. The natural channel is quite narrow and crooked, and at the shallowest place does not give over two or three inches at low water. Much injury has been for years and was then constantly being done to the river by the saw-mills turning their sawdust into it.

[Laughter.]

The motion to strike out was not agreed to.

The Clerk read the following:

Improving Blackwater River, Virginia, $1,500.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. I move to strike out the paragraph just read. This appropriation seems to be for clearing off the "overhanging trees." I think perhaps if they would give the timber to the adjacent settlers they would remove those "overhanging trees" for the sake of the timber, and thus save the Government the expense. That is my reason for offering the amendment.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Improving Chickahominy River, Virginia, $2,000.

Mr. COX. I move to strike out "Chickahominy." [Laughter.] The "Chickahominy" has never been navigable except for the average frog. Our soldiers will tell you that. The Chickahominy has a historic character. John Smith in the early days of Virginia history took a row-boat and went up the Chickahominy expecting to strike the Pacific Ocean. [Laughter.] He never struck it. He struck Pocahontas, who took him back to Jamestown; and the navigation of Virginia rivers has been more or less difficult—especially less—since that time.

Mr. HASKELL. I would like to ask the gentleman whether I am right in my recollection of an old tradition that some craft of John Smith ran aground on one of the bars.

Mr. COX. It stuck in a mud dam on the Kanahwa. [Laughter.]

The amendment of Mr. COX was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Dan River between Danville, Virginia, and Madisen, North Carolina, $8,000.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. I move to strike out this paragraph. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"] I do not think gentlemen will hasten matters in this way. I will not read all that the report says in regard to Dan River; I will only take the sentences which my eye catches, as it were.

It is there stated that the distance from Danbury to Danville—is 77.36 miles; and the cost of improving the river by means of locks and dams so as to give not less than three feet at low water will be $658,000.

The section to be improved—

* * * * * * *

I would, however, state for the benefit of those interested in the improvement of this section of the Dan, that the cost of preparing the river for steam navigation can be reduced by assuming a lesser depth of navigation as the basis of calculation. If a depth of one and a half feet in the pools and two feet in the rapids is assumed we have reason to believe that the ordinary stages of the river will maintain a navigation of not less than three feet for six months of the year. We should have by this method of improvement a slope at no point exceeding ten feet to the mile which if it should be found necessary, could be easily overcome with light-draught steamers by the use of a chain anchored at the head of the rapid and passed around a steam capstan placed in the bow of the boat.

[Laughter.]

Now, I have heard a good deal said about this bill breaking the backs of a couple of gentlemen who are supposed to control the great railroad interests. Just think how these gentlemen must shiver with fear at the thought of this mighty stream being subjected to the commerce of the country by a chain anchored at the head and a line reaching down to the mouth run by steam, so as to "yank" vessels up by the capstan. [Laughter.] The owners of the great railroads, the owners of this monstrous snake which we have recently seen represented with its tail coiled around the Capitol, must shiver with fear when they contemplate the improvement of the Dan River by this kind of means. [Laughter.]

The amendment of Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa, was not agreed to.

Improving Mattaponi River, Virginia, $3,300.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out this paragraph. I have not had time to read the engineer's report in regard to the Mattaponi; but my eye caught a paragraph or two in regard to Pamunkey, and I think I can connect the Pamunkey with the Mattaponi. See whether I cannot. I read from the report:

This river—

which has a greater length and depth than the Mattaponi, rises in Orange County, Virginia, and flows southeast. It takes its name from a tribe of Indians, a remnant of which may still be found on the reservation at Indiantown, near the White House. A survey of the upper part of the river was made by the authority of the State of Virginia in 1836 by Charles B. Shaw, an eminent engineer, whose report may be found in the archives of the State. My short stay in Richmond did not permit me to consult this report. The river above Hanovertown is narrow, tortuous, and much obstructed by logs and trees, but may be made navigable for barges for a distance of from ten to fifteen miles, whenever the trade will warrant the improvement.

That is the report in regard to the Pamunkey, which is stated to be a river of greater length and greater depth than the Mattaponi. The "injudicious friend" of the Mattaponi has spoken in this report; but his language is in fine print, and I cannot get at the points in five minutes. So I have tried to connect the Mattaponi with the Pamunkey.

Mr. BEALE. I wish to correct the pronunciation of the gentleman from Iowa. It is Mattaponi, and not Mattapony. [Laughter.]

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. Very well, I stand corrected.

The motion was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving mouth of Nomoni Creek, Virginia, $2,000.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. For reasons already given, I move to strike out that paragraph.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Pamunkey River, Virginia, $2,500.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. Here is the Pamunkey River again. I thought we had already struck it out. I move, however, to strike it out now. I am sorry for the Pamunkey, but I will be glad to get rid of it. If I am wrong in the pronunciation, I will not pronounce it Pamunkey, but I will pronounce it Pamunki. [Laughter.] I want it stricken out all the same.

The amendment was disagreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Elk River, West Virginia, $5,000.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. I move to strike out that appropriation. I believe some mention has been made in general debate of this mighty stream, but I think perhaps it will be well to put it here in this place.

I see the committee are anxious to correct any mistake they might have fallen into in their nightly studies. The injudicious friend here says:

Before the river can be considered properly prepared for the full development of the trade upon it, which the resources of the country will probably produce and maintain, some or all of the private mill-dams, should be certainly removed or modified. The unexpected cheapness of the project enables the engineer to reduce his estimate from $100,000 to $90,000. From Broxton Court House to the mouth of the Big Sandy the traffic consists almost exclusively of logs floated on the river and of canoes and small boats carrying country produce down the stream and returning with groceries or staves and hoop-poles.

[Laughter.]

Another engineer reports:

Those making use of Elk Creek for floating out logs from the headwaters to the mouth report the work of last season has been of great benefit to their interest, the stream in many places being in appearance a new water-course.

I should think it would.

At Blaine's Island, however, the brush now covering the bar causes the logs to lodge.

Now, if the appropriation were only enough to dislodge the brush there I perhaps would not say anything about it, but considering it goes to the whole extent of the river and involves $90,000—but not in this bill—and as the appropriation is therefore of no value, I will move to strike it out.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Great Kanawha River and operation of works, West Virginia, $200,000.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. I move to strike out that paragraph. Another injudicious friend heard from. The engineer says:

The object aimed at is to collect the water-supply by dams, making at low-water a succession of navigable pools connected by large locks. The peculiarity of most of the dams is they can be lowered when the stage of water in the river will suffice for navigation over the shoals. This gives them the name of movable dams.

They are somewhat different, I presume, from the modified mill-dams, and enables an open river to be had when the water is high enough. [Laughter.]

It is plain, however, that, as the whole system can be completed in the same time as any one of the similar parts, by far the most advantageous course, looking to the utilization of the whole improvement, whose benefits we cannot fully realize until it covers the whole river, would be to make the remainder of the estimate for this work $2,410,000. The whole work could then be finished probably in two or three years.

Well, indeed, may the Kanawha Gazette say that "ever since HEREFORD and KENNA have been our Representatives, the golden stream has poured steadily into our midst, refreshing the hearts and bearing blessings into the hands of our laboring men, their wives and children." It is a good thing to pour blessings down among the laboring men of Kanawha; but other laboring men should have this opportunity, men who like golden streams flowing in upon them just as much as the laboring men of Kanawha.

Mr. KENNA addressed the committee. [See Appendix.]

Mr. COX. Is an amendment necessary?

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted on the pending amendment.

Mr. COX. Then I move to strike out the last word. I am glad I have roused my eloquent friend from West Virginia at last. We are asked, Mr. Chairman, to appropriate large sums of money for these Kanawhas; $200,000 dollars more for this river, the Great Kanawha, tortured with tolls and vexed with all sorts of embarrassment and impediments to navigation.

Mr. KENNA. In what respect?

Mr. COX. By the laws of West Virginia.

Mr. KENNA. I hope the gentleman from New York will yield to me for a minute to answer that question.

Mr. COX. It will afford me a great deal of pleasure to do my friend that courtesy.

Mr. KENNA. I merely want to say in response to that remark that the only tolls that were collected upon that river were collected by a sort of general consent, and were collected by a board created by the Legislature of the State of West Virginia to improve its navigation facilities. That board has acted in co-operation with the Government in improving the river, and never, in any sense, in conflict with it, and will be abolished at any time, without opposition, when its action is regarded as conflicting in any sense whatever with the interests of the Government or the commerce of the river. It was created to facilitate that commerce, and not in any sense to embarrass it.

Mr. COX. Well, I knew they were making money out of somebody. Now, we are giving money out of the Federal Treasury from Texas to Maine and for the improvement of rivers that tax everything from a hoop-pole down to a stave. Why, Mr. Chairman, even in that river a catfish has to wear his nose off in getting over the sand-bars. [Great laughter.]

This money is scattered all the way from New York, Illinois, Texas, all these great items of the bill which it is proposed to pass under some peculiar motion in this House.

Oh, I wish we could just call a halt. People are calling a halt now. The people in this country are opposed to all this business. They think this democratic Congress is dying with a hip, hip, hurrah. False economy, all that sort of thing, is going to be brought up here against us.

I am waiting for somebody interested in this measure to say something. I say that the people all over this country do not like these great appropriations for such objects. They will call a halt before long.

Now I ask my friend from Maryland, [Mr. MCLANE,] who I see is on the alert, to look up the old messages embodying good old democratic doctrine, irrespective of all else, and give us the dividing line on this question. That is what we want.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I send an amendment to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. COX. I did not call upon that gentleman from New York.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MCLANE] is recognized.

Mr. MCLANE. I rise to oppose the amendment of the gentleman from New York; and in the five minutes I have at my command I want to cover two points made by that gentleman.

In the first place, as to these canals and dams and all this interior navigation, looking only to my own opinion and to my own political leaning, I should have preferred, doubtless, as my friend from New York who usually sits near me, to follow my instincts of human nature and to have looked after the harbors on the seaboard and the great rivers that flow into the Atlantic. And if I had been as selfish as that honorable gentleman and his colleague from New York supposes, I would have confined my support to those harbors on the Atlantic and those great rivers that run into the salt water. But through a long life in public affairs I have come to know that the interior rivers and the great headwaters of the country are as much involved in the common welfare and are as completely in the power of Congress as the harbors on the Atlantic and the streams that run into the Atlantic; and therefore I am disposed in this bill to give the same facilities to the primitive people who live upon the headwaters of these great streams that I give to the harbors on the Atlantic and the streams that run into the Atlantic. That has guided me, and that has guided the committee in the preparation of this bill. And woe be to the gentleman from Iowa if his people ever have to sit in judgment upon him for standing here to-day ready to vote the money of the country for the harbors on the Atlantic and the great rivers that run into the ocean when he denies to the Upper Mississippi and the Upper Missouri the same facilities that we give to the Atlantic coast and to the rivers that are mere estuaries of the sea.

And now a word to my friend from New York on the left, [Mr. COX.] He has undertaken to give us a lesson in democracy. Mr. Chairman, I wish I could know in him an individual democrat who by his practice can afford to teach us fidelity to the democratic party. I wish I could know in him (a gentleman whose intelligence and brightness we are constantly called upon to admire) one who could teach us the application of sound democratic principles. I wish we could look to him as a tried guide to control us either in the precedents or the principles of the democratic party.

That gentleman has stood here day after day talking to us about democratic Presidents who have vetoed river and harbor bills. Does he recollect that Thomas Jefferson signed a river and harbor bill, that James Madison signed a river and harbor bill, that James Monroe signed a river and harbor bill, that Andrew Jackson signed river and harbor bills, and that Martin Van Buren signed a river and harbor bill? Does the gentleman forget when he quoted the message of James K. Polk that James Buchanan was his Secretary of State, that William L. Marcy was his Secretary of War, that Robert J. Walker was his Secretary of the Treasury, and those three men, more distinguished in intelligence and experience than any three men that my honorable friend can name, were fully committed to the support of river and harbor improvements? So when he quoted the veto message of President Pierce, does he recollect that W. L. Marcy was his Secretary of State, James Guthrie, of Kentucky, his Secretary of the Treasury, and Robert McClelland, of Michigan, his Secretary of the Interior, all fully committed to the support of river and harbor improvements? I have further to remind him that these veto messages are only of interest as criticisms upon the details of river and harbor bills, and in nowise conflict with the principle that the navigable waters of the United States should be improved by the Government of the United States, and that these navigable waters have been defined by the laws of the United States since 1789 to extend to fresh waters navigable from the sea, and since 1845 to extend to the Great Lakes and waters not navigable from the sea.

[Here the hammer fell, and Mr. MCLANE asked permission to publish in the RECORD further criticisms on these messages.]

Mr. FROST. I move to strike out the last two words, and give the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MCLANE] my time.

The CHAIRMAN. That amendment is not now in order, as there are two amendments pending.

Mr. COX. Let the gentleman be permitted to go on.

Mr. REAGAN. I hope we will go on and vote.

Mr. COX. I can answer all the gentleman has said in one word.

Mr. MCLANE. I do not feel disposed to trespass long upon the indulgence of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. MCLANE. I thought I was permitted to proceed by unanimous consent.

Mr. COX. I have been trying for two days to get my friend from Maryland to make this speech, and I want to hear the end of it. It is very eloquent

Mr. REAGAN. The debate is very interesting; but I am much more anxious for the bill than for the debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. UPDEGRAFF] moves to strike out the paragraph, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. VAN VOORHIS] offers an amendment to amend the text, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 420 strike out the words "hundred thousand," so that it will read:
"Improving Great Kanawha River and operation of works, West Virginia, $2."

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I wish to call this discussion back to the question before the House. Already $1,142,000 of the people's money have been sunk in the bed of the Great Kanawha. The engineers estimate that $2,410,000 more are needed to finish the job. All told, this aggregates the snug little sum of $3,552,000 salted and to be salted away here. When done this improvement is worthless. It is a lock-and-dam improvement. And every such improvement is practically worthless. In other words, a canal is to be made of this river, with locks made at the cost of the Government around private mill-dams. In the words of the engineer's report:

The object aimed at is to collect the water supply by dams, making at low-water a succession of navigable pools connected by large locks. The peculiarity of most of the dams is that they can be lowered when the stage of the water in the river will suffice for navigation over the shoals. This gives them the name of movable dams and enables an open river to be had when the water is high enough.

Here it is easily seen the United States has gone into the canal business. It must for all time man this canal and superintend its operations. It must provide men to move the dams when a raft comes along and the water is high enough to permit it to sail over the dam when thus modified.

There are seven or eight of these locks and dams, and they are to cost $350,000 apiece. It was expected that tolls would be charged on this canal. The engineer says, speaking of the expenses of the care and operation of the locks and dams when completed:

It was supposed these expenses would be covered in the usual way, by the collection of tolls on freights passing through and using the improved channels.

* * * * * * *

Congress did not adopt this view, but included the cost of maintenance among others to be paid from the last appropriation.

So somebody else pockets the tolls and the Government pays all the working expenses. There are no statistics given by the engineer showing that there is any considerable commerce on this river.

I judge from the proposal published in the engineer's report that timber is scarce and the price high in that locality. The offers to sell timber to the Government for this work range from $26 to $35 per 1,000 feet. Plank, probably hemlock, are offered from $23 to $29.90 per 1,000 feet. These high prices of lumber are doubtless owing to the fact that it has to be transported a long distance to reach that locality. The item in this bill is only $200,000.

Mr. BOWMAN. I have taken no time of the committee before, and I propose to take but a few minutes now. I do so only because of the general remarks of the gentleman from New York and others. The search of Japhet for his father was nothing compared to the search of this House for the principle at the foundation of this bill. There is no principle upon which this bill is founded except that of political expediency.

I say that these bills brought in here year by year should be founded on some settled principle. Such a principle exists, though it is not that stated by some members of this House. The question of navigability has nothing to do with it. Inland streams or land-bound lakes may be navigable, but not national water-ways in any true sense of the word. Judge Story, in his work on the Constitution, lays down the exact doctrine, closely and critically, which should be maintained in these cases. He says:

A true test is whether the object be of a local character and local use, or whether it be of general benefit to the States.

That is, to the nation.

If it be purely local, Congress cannot constitutionally appropriate money for the object.

That is the test. It is not a test of law; it is not to be decided by the opinions of a court. The question is one of common sense, one of practical business judgment. Now, when I ask a member of this House if the Cowlitz River, or the Tickfaw River, or the Yallabusha River, or the Tchula Lake is a national water-way, a national river, every man knows without splitting hairs that they are not national water-ways, not great water-ways for the vessels and the commerce of the nation; but they are merely local streams or bayous or inland lakes.

Take the great harbors on the Atlantic coast. The harbors of Baltimore, Philadelphia, New York, and Boston do not belong to New York, Pennsylvania, Massachusetts, and Maryland. They are the harbors of the country, and they bear upon their bosoms the wheat and the corn and the products of the great West. They are the doors of the whole country, through which pass the manufactures, the products, and the commerce of this country to foreign countries. The harbor of Boston belongs to Minnesota and to Iowa and to the whole country. So does the harbor of New York.

There is the great test. These great rivers, the Mississippi and the Ohio, which flow through the country and empty into the Gulf, are national highways, national water-ways, for the benefit of all the people of the country, irrespective of locality. That, I believe, is the test which should be brought to bear here.

Now, apply that test to this bill item by item, and how it would shrivel up and disappear. How many items of this bill will stand that test? When I ask the chairman of the Committee on Commerce if this creek or that bayou or that stream, with six inches of water and overhanging trees and mill-dams, is a national highway, a national water-way, as an honest man he must reply, "No; it is not a national water-way."

Mr. REAGAN rose.

Mr. BOWMAN. In a moment. He must say, "It is not a national water-way, but I differ from you on your doctrine of law." He may consistently differ with me on the doctrine of law, but can he, will he tell me that those are national water-ways?

Mr. REAGAN. That is not the question. The question is not, "Is it a national river?" but it is, "Is the improvement for the benefit of national commerce?"

Mr. BOWMAN. The question as laid down by Judge Story is: Is it an improvement of a local character, for local benefit, for the benefit of a brick-yard, or a saw-mill, a country village, or a country town, or even a county? Is it of local benefit, or is it of national benefit for the whole country and for all the people of the country?

Mr. REAGAN. Let us have a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate has been exhausted upon the pending amendment.

Mr. REAGAN. If we cannot have a vote now, I will move that the committee rise for the purpose of closing debate on the pending paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. That is a matter which the Chair cannot determine.

Mr. REAGAN. I move that the committee rise.

Mr. PAGE. I think the committee is ready to vote. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. COX. I wish my friend from Maryland [Mr. MCLANE] could be allowed to finish his remarks.

Mr. REAGAN. We have had debating society enough; we want to pass the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] insist upon his motion that the committee rise?

Mr. REAGAN. I will withdraw it.

Mr. VALENTINE. I renew the motion.

Mr. REAGAN. Let us have a vote on the amendment.

The question was taken on the motion that the committee rise, and it was not agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. VAN VOORHIS.]

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. ANDERSON. I move to amend the paragraph which reads "Improving Great Kanawha River, and operation of works, West Virginia, $200,000;" striking out "$200,000," and inserting the exact amount which is given for improving the Mississippi, Missouri, and Arkansas Rivers; that is, "$150,000."

Now, it seems to me that amendment should be adopted for the reason, first, that it will be a matter of economy and avoid a waste of the people's money; second, for the reason that the whole theory of this bill proceeds on the idea of national commerce. Now, I have nothing in the world to say against the commerce of the Great Kanawha; undoubtedly it is great.

But I suggest to gentlemen that if they will look at the map of the United States, and endeavor to comprehend to some extent the ideas which God Almighty had in His mind when He made this continent, with these great mountain ranges on the one side and the Rocky Mountains on the other, and between them the grand agricultural basin of the world, which is going to feed the world, and in that basin the Mississippi, the Missouri, the Ohio, and the whole system of streams, it will be seen that He knew something about what would be necessary for the commerce of this great nation. When as a nation we undertake to provide for the improvement of the Great Kanawha by expending $200,000, perhaps we had better give to the Mississippi, the Missouri, and the Arkansas a similar amount; or if the question is one of democratic "economy," and this nation cannot afford to do that, then perhaps we may as well reduce the appropriation for the Great Kanawha to the same amount that we give to the vast system of streams driving the very commerce of the continent.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. ANDERSON, it was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Guyandotte River, West Virginia, $3,500.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. I move to strike out this paragraph. I desire only to call attention to the report of the engineers which the Committee on Commerce, through their chairman, say they have set up at nights to study since the commencement of this session.

The present plan of the improvement—

was adopted in 1878, and has been carried on in accordance with this to date, the object being to improve the whole river for raft navigation primarily, and for push-boat navigation at certain special points. For both species of navigation the river was practically closed save on rises of considerable height.

Now, I take occasion to say in reply to the gentleman from West Virginia, that I have said nothing with reference to the Great Kanawha or the Guyandotte or the State of West Virginia or himself except what I find in the reports of the engineers—reports which his chairman says he has studied sedulously night and day since this session commenced—and also what I find in an extract from his own home paper. My testimony against this bill is confined, as I have said, to the testimony of injudicious friends. I regret that I have nothing better; but so far as it goes there is no better testimony among mankind than the testimony of injudicious friends—that which is read "between the lines" or which escapes unconsciously. Well, indeed, did the Kanawha Gazette, speaking of the appropriations in the bill of last year, say:

The third district—

That is the district represented by my "injudicious friend" on the other side—receives more this year from the public Treasury than the net amount of all the taxes that have gone into the Treasury from the whole State of West Virginia for five years.

Mr. BOWMAN. Mr. Chairman, [cries of "Vote!" Vote!"] I only want to say one sentence by way of personal explanation lest I be misunderstood. I am in favor of a river and harbor bill; I think it would be a great calamity not to have such a bill go through. I do not wish to be misunderstood; but I do say that, in the language of the gentleman New York, we ought to "cry a halt;" we ought to establish a principle which should be followed from year to year and from Congress to Congress; we ought to get rid of this desultory legislation and this passing of river and harbor bills for any purpose but the public good.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. I want to say a single word in reference to the remarks of my colleague, [Mr. BOWMAN,] who has attacked the small appropriations made in this bill. He has very well and very wisely pressed upon the Committee of the Whole the importance of improving the great harbors of Boston, Baltimore, and Philadelphia. He says that these are doors which we want to open wide for commerce to pour out. Now, I regret that his vision is so clouded he cannot see that into these doors must flow this commerce, and that it goes in small streams from these outlets and rivers. The cotton of the South comes into these great ports, and the products of the forest, the southern pine, &c., come from the small rivers of the South into these large ones. It is from these small streams that the great commerce coming into these ports is made up. It must come in as well as go out.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I move to amend the amendment by striking out in line 421 the word "three," and in line 422 the word "thousand," so as to make the appropriation $500. The engineer says of this improvement:

The operations have been in general a continuation of those of previous years, namely: improving the natural channel of the river for raft navigation by removing the natural obstructions in the river, and the artificial obstructions in the shape of the remains of the old lock at the falls of Guyandotte, and the wreck of an old mill-dam at Little Ugly Shoals.

Summarized, the operations covered about twenty miles of river, improving and rendering easier for rafting this stretch.

The engineer also reports:

No permanent or entire completion can be made of the present project—

I call particular attention to this—

No permanent or entire completion can be made of the present project; the most that can be effected * * * is to each year remove the obstructions due to the previous high water, and gradually enlarge and extend the improvement.

The cost of this work this year is to be $2,500; last year it was $5,000. The estimate is only $2,000, but somebody has a mill to sell and that is put into the estimate at $1,500, thus swelling the estimate to $3,500. This is one of the little frauds contained in this bill.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. VAN VOORHIS, it was not agreed to.

The question recurring on the amendment of Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa, it was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Little Kanawha River, West Virginia, $20,000.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. I move to strike out the paragraph just read. I desire only to read the testimony of another "injudicious friend." The engineer says, with reference to the Little Kanawha:

The present plan of improvement was adopted in 1877, having for its object the attainment of raft and push-boat navigation at lower stages than was before practicable and generally facilitating both classes of navigation, especially the former, from Bulltown to the present slack-water.

I wish the House and the country to understand that this stream is not now navigable for push-boats, that the object and the only object of this appropriation is to make it navigable for push-boats and rafts; and that is all that is pretended for it.

Now, one other consideration, and I do not wish to be considered sectional, and what I believe to be my duty to say I intend to say here. I wish to call the attention of gentlemen on the other side of the House to this fact: that the democratic party having a majority in this House and in the other, will be held responsible by the country for this bill. Furthermore, the southern section of the democratic party will be held largely responsible for it. I am rejoiced to see here men from that section who disdain its provisions, who have refused them, and cast at their feet its blandishments. But that section, nevertheless, will be chargeable with this bill, and I will prove it to you out of the mouth of the injudicious friends upon whom, as I have already said, most of my testimony, unfortunately, rests.

The Kanawha Gazette, the injudicious friend, said of the bill of last year, speaking of it in pride and exultation: "See," pointing with pride to it, "this is some of the results of the democratic economy and southern supremacy." [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"] Excuse me, but I have not read it correctly; I will read it over again. [Laughter.]

Some of the results of democratic economy and southern supremacy may be seen in the river and harbor bill as applied to the great State of West Virginia, which has a solid democratic delegation at Washington.

The Gazette further says:

The Kanawha River receives as much as the harbor of New York, and Charleston as much as the city of Philadelphia for its harbor.

I ask you, my southern friends, are you willing to take all this? [Cries of "Yes, yes; and more too!" and laughter.] Very well, then, having taken it, when your newspapers gloat over it, exult over it, and claim it as the result of democratic supremacy and southern supremacy, then when the people of the North who pay the money to furnish these appropriations object to it, will you come up and say they are sectional?

Mr. PAGE. I wish for a moment to ask the gentleman from West Virginia a question. I wish to ask whether the Legislature of West Virginia has incorporated a company for the improvement of this river and allowed that company to take toll?

Mr. KENNA. My colleague desires to answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. WILSON. Some years ago, when there was some difficulty in getting out timber and oil from that section of the country, we were compelled to organize a company for the purpose of building a dam just in the same way as it has been done upon other like streams in the United States.

Mr. PAGE. Do I understand the gentleman from West Virginia to say to the House that there is a company incorporated under an act of the Legislature of West Virginia that has improved this river and is now collecting tolls upon it?

Mr. WILSON. I will explain that a little more fully when I get the floor for that purpose.

Mr. PAGE. That is all I wish to know, whether any part of it for which appropriation is made in this bill——

Mr. WILSON. No part for which they ask a Government appropriation.

Mr. PAGE. But this is made for the whole Kanawha.

Mr. WILSON. This is made for that part where the Government has already made improvement.

Mr. PAGE. It is not limited in this bill.

Mr. WILSON. Oh, yes it is.

Mr. PAGE. No; it is for the improvement of the Little Kanawha River, West Virginia.

Mr. KENNA. And for the continuation of work which has been already commenced.

Mr. PAGE. There is nothing of that kind in the bill.

Mr. WILSON. But that is the fact.

Mr. PAGE. I do not rise for the purpose of objecting. I only want to know the fact, because I heard it stated, and sending for the statutes of West Virginia I found that a company has been incorporated with authority to collect toll. If that be true, it seems to me there should be some provision attached to this paragraph which will prevent these people from taking toll, or the Legislature of West Virginia should be compelled to repeal the law which allows private individuals to collect toll on a river proposed to be improved by the General Government.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I move in line 424 to amend by striking out the word "thousand." This Little Kanawha River runs through a country where the farms stand up edgewise. [Laughter.] This is a work on which about sixty thousand dollars have been spent, and nine hundred thousand more are wanted. I do not believe all the land on either side of that river from Parkersburgh to Burning Springs, for a distance of five miles each way from the river, is worth that sum. This is one of the mountain torrents of West Virginia. It is well watered only in times of freshet. This river is afflicted with numerous private mill-dams, and one object of the improvement is to provide chutes or sluices in these private mill-dams so as to permit logs to pass over when the water is high enough for that. The engineer says in his report:

To carry out this plan the natural obstructions to navigation (that is to say between mill-dams) have been removed, timber chutes provided with suitable gates built in private mill-dams, to pass rafts through, which otherwise would be held in the pool above.

It would be economy for the United States to buy all the logs and timber within reach of this river and present them to West Virginia in lieu of throwing a million dollars into this so-called improvement.

Mr. PAGE. The gentleman from West Virginia has prepared an amendment which will meet the objection I have made.

The CHAIRMAN. The first question is on the amendment of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. KENNA. I hope my colleague from West Virginia will not offer that amendment to this section.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment——

Mr. PAGE. I supposed that the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON] intended to offer an amendment at this point, and I now wish to state that I shall offer one myself, to insert or incorporate a provision that no tolls shall be permitted to be collected by any private corporation over any part of the river that is improved by the General Government.

Mr. KENNA. There certainly can be no objection to that. I did not understand the scope of the amendment which it was contemplated my colleague was to offer.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Suppose the improvement is above where the tolls are collected, it will still inure to the benefit of the corporations.

Mr. PAGE. If the committee, after I have called its attention to this fact, do not deem it necessary to incorporate such a provision, I have no objection to allowing it to remain as it is.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from West Virginia has forwarded to the desk an amendment which covers the point, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That no toll shall be collected by the Little Kanawha Navigation Company on that part of the river improved by the Federal Government.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is now on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Iowa, which is to strike out the entire paragraph.

The motion to strike out was not agreed to.

Mr. CALKINS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to come in after line 424.

The Clerk read as follows:

For straightening and improving the Kankakee River in the State of Indiana, $100,000.

Mr. FORT. I ask the gentleman to modify his amendment so as to include also the State of Illinois.

Mr. CALKINS. I accept that modification. I hold in my hand, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. COX. I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COX. I have not been able to understand whether this amendment relates to a general or local river.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has not been informed as to that.

Mr. COX. I would like to have the amendment read again.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. CALKINS. I hold in my hand a joint resolution recently passed by the Legislature of the State of Indiana, asking for this appropriation, which I will incorporate here in my remarks. It is as follows:

Hon. W. H. CALKINS, M. C.:

I am directed by the General Assembly of the State of Indiana to transmit to you the following concurrent resolutions adopted by the senate and concurred in by the house of representatives, February 2, 1881.

Respectfully,

C. W. BROWNE,
Principal Secretary of Senate.

Concurrent resolution of the General Assembly of the State of Indiana.

Whereas the Kankakee River in the State of Indiana may be made a navigable stream through the counties of Lake, Newton, Porter, Jasper, La Porte, Starke, and Saint Joseph, a distance of eighty miles from the town of Momence, in the State of Illinois; and

Whereas the channel of the said river can be straightened and deepened for an expenditure of $100,000: Therefore,

Resolved by the senate, (the house concurring,) That the Senators and Representatives of the State of Indiana now in Congress of the United States are hereby requested to vote for an appropriation by the General Government of $100,000, to be applied in deepening, widening, and straightening, wherever necessary, the Kankakee River in the State of Indiana, and to use their best efforts to procure passage of the same.

Resolved, That the secretary of the senate be, and is hereby, instructed to furnish each member of Congress from this State a copy of the concurrent resolution of this General Assembly asking an appropriation of $100,000 by the General Government for the improvement of the Kankakee River, and the proceedings of the two houses thereon.

By the improvement of this river it will connect a net-work of railroads, I believe seven in number, and bring them all together. This has been recommended by the engineer, but has not been appropriated for.

While I do not complain generally of the Committee on Commerce, still the boundaries of my State have been so changed in this bill that I simply want to state them in order that they may be understood generally. They are as follows: We are bounded on the east by Ohio, $401,000; on the north by Michigan, $500,000; on the west by Illinois, $912,000; on the south by Kentucky, $304,000; and $75,000 for Indiana.

Mr. FORT. I wish to say only a word on this subject. On this river above Momence there is to-day four feet of water all the year round for a distance of one hundred and fifty miles. If twenty-five miles of this river is improved at the lower end, it will give one hundred and seventy-five miles of navigation, passing through a portion of Illinois and into Indiana; so that there can be no question but what this river is important. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, I rather favor that appropriation, myself. I have been up on that Kankakee River shooting ducks. The last time I was there for that purpose I had great difficulty in navigating its waters. The waters were a little low, however.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Chairman, no plan or estimate has been submitted for this improvement.

Mr. FORT. The gentleman from Texas is mistaken. The river has been surveyed, and the survey reports four feet of water all the year round.

Mr. FINLEY. I believe I have the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio has not yielded the floor as the Chair understands.

Mr. FORT. I merely wish to reply to the gentleman from Texas, the chairman of the committee.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, I do not know what part of the Kankakee River the gentleman proposes to improve, but I have shot ducks up in the district of the gentleman who moves that amendment.

Mr. BROWNE. Were they tame ducks? [Laughter.]

Mr. FINLEY. And I fully concur as to the difficulty in navigating that stream.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Perhaps they were canvas-backs.

Mr. FINLEY. And before you improve it, you must make arrangements for taking up the railroad bridge; and, secondly, pour water into the creek.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Indiana.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. BROWNE. I move that the committee now rise, with a view not to move to adjourn but to take a recess. We have been here now for seven hours, and the committee will soon find itself without a quorum unless something of the kind is done.

Mr. REAGAN. I would be very glad if the committee would consent to go on a while longer.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would suggest that possibly the Clerk might be able to read for some time yet without amendment; and if so considerable progress might be made. [Cries of "Read!" "Read!"]

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I offer the amendment I send to the desk, to come in as an additional paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 424 insert the following:

"Improving main branch Chicago River, Illinois, by dredging, as suggested in Engineer's report, transmitted to this House by the Secretary of War, under date of December 15, 1880, $20,000."

Mr. BROWNE. I now insist on my motion that the committee rise.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I yield for no such motion. I would like the attention of the House for a moment, and I ask particularly the attention of the Committee on Commerce. This morning when I made an attempt to have some of the money appropriated to Chicago Harbor applied for the purpose of improving the inner harbor, it was stated by the chairman of the committee that no estimate had been made for that improvement, and that our people in Chicago did not desire it. I wish the Clerk to read the telegrams which I send to the desk, and to which I invite the attention of the House.

FEBRUARY 16, 1881.

Hon. CHARLES RANDOLPH,
Secretary Board of Trade, Chicago, Illinois:

Is there opposition by our people to the Government's improving main branch by dredging to seventeen feet from wall to wall? Answer.

GEORGE R. DAVIS.

CHICAGO, ILLINOIS, February 16, 1881.

Hon. G. R. DAVIS, House of Representatives:

I have never heard of any opposition by our people to any dredging by the Government in our river or anywhere else about our harbor. Dredging in the river is greatly needed.

CHARLES RANDOLPH,
Secretary.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Now, on the 15th of December, last year, the Secretary of War transmitted to the Speaker of this House a report of the engineer on duty at Chicago, and in said report I find the following. Speaking of the main branch of the Chicago River, the engineer says:

That it is practically a narrow bay projecting from Lake Michigan into the business center of Chicago, through which the entire lake commerce of that city passes. * * * It has been widened and deepened to a width of from two hundred to three hundred feet, and a navigable depth of 14.5 feet at mean low water. * * * Evidently it is of great importance to the vessel interests that the largest craft shall be able to pass through this reach of the river with absolute certainty of always finding ample depth of water; for through this main river must pass all the commerce that penetrates to the extreme points of the north and south branches, which branches, with their slips and basins, give an aggregate water frontage of thirty-eight miles. Vessels lying at the docks, frequently from two to five abreast, contract the channel-way to very narrow limits, and it frequently happens that it is completely blocked by the grounding of a single large craft.

The loss occasioned by these delays and the actual damage to vessels, which are mixed up and jammed together when the blockade occurs, amounts to a very considerable sum every season. The most simple remedy is to dredge the river to a depth that will give ample water.

The approximate amount of dredging required for this purpose would cost about $55,000.

This estimate is based on dredging the full width of the river between the dock-lines.

I wish to add a single word. This district pays annually a revenue of eleven and a half millions of dollars into the Treasury of the United States. It has floating on this three-quarters of a mile over eight millions of tonnage per annum. I believe, in justice to the vast interests at Chicago, this House should give something for this improvement.

Mr. BROWNE. I now renew the motion that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. BLACKBURN having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. CARLISLE reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 7104) making appropriations for the construction, completion, repair, and preservation of certain works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. REAGAN. I move that the House take a recess till half past seven o'clock.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. And I move that the House do now adjourn.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Pending a motion to adjourn,

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted, as follows:

To Mr. KITCHIN, from Friday, the 20th, until Tuesday, the 24th instant, on account of sickness in his family;

To Mr. CRAVENS, indefinitely, on account of sickness of himself and wife;

To Mr. CABELL, for two days, on account of important business; and

To Mr. VAN AERNAM, until the 21st instant, on account of important business.

Mr. CARLISLE. I ask leave of absence from this evening's session for the members of the committee appointed by the House to attend the obsequies of the late Hon. FERNANDO WOOD. They will be compelled to leave this evening to go to Pittsburgh.

There was no objection, and leave of absence was granted.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

By unanimous consent, Mr. BENNETT obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD some remarks on the bill H. R. No. 1306 and the bill H. R. No. 3225. [See Appendix.]

LEASING OF PUBLIC LANDS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a memorial of the Legislature of Montana, protesting against the passage of any law authorizing the leasing by the General Government of any public lands; which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

MONTANA PENITENTIARY.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also laid before the House a memorial of the Legislature of Montana, in relation to the Montana penitentiary; which was referred to the Committee on the Territories.

EDWARD FITZPATRICK.

Mr. MULLER, by unanimous consent, submitted to the House the following resolution; which was read and referred to the Committee on Accounts:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives be authorized and directed to pay out of the contingent fund of the House to the brother and sister of Edward Fitzpatrick, late messenger in the House Post-Office, a sum equal to his salary for three months, and also the necessary funeral expenses of the deceased, not to exceed the sum of $200.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. VAN VOORHIS,] that the House do now adjourn.

The question being taken, the motion was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question recurs on the motion of the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN,] that the House take a recess until half past seven o'clock this evening.

Mr. ANDERSON. I move to amend so that the recess shall be taken until half past nine on Thursday morning.

A MEMBER. Is that amendment in order when the House has determined that the session shall commence at eleven o'clock?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The amendment is in order. The House might go into a recess until half past nine, and if it so determined could adjourn before eleven.

Mr. REAGAN. I hope the amendment will not be agreed to.

The question being taken on the amendment, it was not agreed to.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. What becomes of my motion to adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I called for a division.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair did not hear the gentleman.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. Then I renew the motion that the House do now adjourn.

The question being taken viva voce,

The SPEAKER pro tempore stated that the "noes" evidently had it.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I call for a division. [After a pause.] I withdraw the demand for a division.

So the motion was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question recurs on the motion that the House take a recess until half past seven o'clock this evening.

The question being taken, the motion was agreed to.

Mr. REAGAN. Before the result of the vote is announced I wish to say to members that I very much hope they will return to the session to-night; otherwise a call of the House will be necessary.

The result of the vote was then announced; and accordingly (at five o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.) the House took a recess until half past seven o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House reassembled at seven o'clock and thirty minutes p. m., (Wednesday, February 16,) Mr. BLACKBURN taking the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. ATKINS. I rise to make a privileged report.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I ask the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] to yield to me for a moment to ask a conference on a pension bill.

Mr. ATKINS. I will do so if it takes no time.

WILLIAM HAMILL.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I ask consent to take from the Speaker's table House bill No. 3788, granting an increase of pension to William Hamill, returned from the Senate with amendments.

There was no objection, and the bill and amendments were taken from the Speaker's table.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I move that the amendments of the Senate be disagreed to, and that a conference be asked on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore appointed as the conferees on the part of the House Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee, Mr. DAVIS of Illinois, and Mr. COVERT of New York.

MASONIC CELEBRATION AT LOUISVILLE, KENTUCKY.

Mr. WILLIS. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Military Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of the joint resolution (H. R. No. 393) authorizing the Secretary of War to loan certain tents, flags, &c., to the Masons at Louisville, Kentucky, and that it be considered in the House at this time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The joint resolution will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objections.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Whereas the Masonic fraternity of the State of Kentucky are preparing to hold a celebration of Saint John's Day for the benefit of the Masonic Widows and Orphans' Home located in Louisville, Kentucky: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c., That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to send from some convenient Government arsenal or arsenals, to be used at said celebration to be held in June, 1881, four pieces of artillery, and such tents, tent-poles, flags, standards, guidons, and camp equipage as they may require, said cannon, tents, and other Government property to be returned after the holding of said celebration in as like good condition as when received: Provided, That the same can be spared without detriment or injury to the public service: And provided further, That all transportation of said articles to and from the place of celebration to the arsenal shall be without expense to the United States: And provided further, That the adjutant-general of the State of Kentucky, or other proper accounting officer, shall receipt for said arms, tents, flags, and camp equipage in the name of said State, and that such of them as shall not be returned shall be charged to said State and deducted out of the sum, amount, and share of the annual sum of $200,000 appropriated for the purpose of providing arms and equipments for the whole body of the militia which may be assignable, or distributable, or allotted to said State of Kentucky.

There being no objection, the Committee on Military Affairs was discharged from the further consideration of the joint resolution, and the same was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WILLIS moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. PRICE. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Calendar——

Mr. ATKINS. Mr. Speaker, I have not yielded the floor.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair cannot, in justice to the House, allow the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] to take the floor and yield to gentlemen on one side of the House to the exclusion of those on the other side.

Mr. ATKINS. I have not been asked by any gentleman to yield.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not the fault of the Chair.

Mr. ATKINS. It is not my fault, certainly. I could not yield when I was not asked to yield. I protest that I am not off the floor.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] will remember that no recognition to the floor can be made except by the Chair.

Mr. ATKINS. That is true; and the Chair recognized me.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. And the gentleman yielded twice; and the Chair now recognizes the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. PRICE.]

Mr. ATKINS. I was not aware that when I yielded to either of the gentlemen I was giving up the floor. If I had so understood it, I certainly would not have yielded. It has been the common practice in this House for gentlemen to take the floor and yield to others before they called up their own business; sometimes to a half dozen of them.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair simply desires to state to the gentleman from Tennessee that it is not in the power of any member of the House to take the control of the floor away from the

Speaker. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. PRICE.]

UNCLAIMED DIVIDENDS OF NATIONAL BANKS.

Mr. PRICE. I ask unanimous consent that there be taken from the House Calendar to be considered at this time the bill (H. R. No. 6847) to provide for the distribution of unclaimed dividends among the creditors of national banks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill will be read.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Comptroller of the Currency, three months before the declaration of the final dividend in favor of the creditors of any national bank, may publish for one month in a newspaper in the place where the bank is located, or in a newspaper nearest thereto, a list of all creditors who have not claimed their dividends, stating the amount thereof, with notice that such dividends must be claimed within three months from the date of such notice; and the Comptroller is hereby authorized to distribute, at the expiration of the said three months' notice, the amount of such unclaimed dividends, pro rata, among the other creditors of the bank.

Mr. PRICE. I desire to state that this is a unanimous report from the Committee on Banking and Currency. This bill is to enable the Comptroller of the Currency to make a final settlement with national banks that have been in the hands of receivers, some of them for years.

There was no objection, and the bill was taken from the House Calendar, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PRICE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

GEORGE W. HENDERLITE.

Mr. RICHMOND. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Calendar for consideration at this time the bill (H. R. No. 6034) for the relief of the personal representative of George W. Henderlite, deceased.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill will be read.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to make such an allowance to George W. Henderlite, deceased, late collector of internal revenue for the eighth collection district of Virginia, as will make his net compensation equal to $2,500 per annum for the time he held the office of collector as aforesaid; and a sum sufficient to make payment of such allowance is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the personal representative of said George W. Henderlite, deceased.

Mr. BURROWS. Is that a unanimous report from the Committee on Ways and Means?

Mr. RICHMOND. It is.

There being no objection, the bill was taken from the Calendar of the Committee of the Whole, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. RICHMOND moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. KELLEY. I desire——

Mr. WELLS. I rise to make a conference report.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will send it up.

Mr. ATKINS. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ATKINS. My point of order is that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WELLS] cannot take the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] from the floor after he has been recognized by the Chair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has not recognized the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] as entitled to the floor.

Mr. ATKINS. Did not the Chair recognize the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WELLS] states that he rises to make a conference report.

Mr. ATKINS. Precisely; and that is what I want to do.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. But the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] never stated to the Chair that he rose to make a conference report.

Mr. ATKINS. I distinctly stated it.

A MEMBER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] said he rose to make a privileged report.

Mr. KELLEY. I think one minute will be sufficient to dispose of the business to which I am about to invite the attention of the House, and as it is so meritorious I think that minute will be granted. There lies on the Speaker's table——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair must state to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WELLS] is in possession of the floor for the purpose of submitting a report from a committee of conference, which will now be read.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 6730) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various tribes for the year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, and 27, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: Restore in each case the words "including traveling expenses of agents;" and the Senate agree to the same.

As to amendments numbered 30 and 31, the committee are unable to agree.

ERASTUS WELLS,
O. R. SINGLETON,
JAY A. HUBBELL,
Managers on the part of the House.
JAS. B. BECK,
WILLIAM A. WALLACE,
WILLIAM WINDOM,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. CONGER. I call for the reading of the statement required by the rule to accompany a conference report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The effect of the report is to include the traveling expenses of agents under the "general and incidental expenses of the Indian service," so that such agents may be paid their traveling expenses out of the sums appropriated under that head.

And the report makes no recommendation in the matter of amendments numbered 30 and 31, which concerns the retention or abolition of the ten citizens known as the commission of citizens appointed by the President.

Mr. WELLS. Mr. Speaker, under the general incidental expenses of the Indian service in Arizona, New Mexico, and several other Territories, the bill as passed by the House provided for paying incidental and traveling expenses of agents as well as the transportation of supplies for these different Indian tribes. The Senate struck out the provision in regard to traveling expenses of agents and transportation of supplies. The House conferees have concurred in that portion of the amendment striking out the provision for transportation of supplies, but they recommend retaining the provision for traveling expenses of agents. This recommendation is made under the advice of the Secretary of the Interior.

It will be remembered that the bill as passed by the House contained a provision—

That all laws and parts of laws creating or authorizing the commission of ten citizens provided for in the act of April 10, 1869, be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

The Senate refused to concur in this provision. They struck it out, and inserted a paragraph reinstating the Indian commissioners by making an appropriation of $10,000 for their expenses. In regard to this question the conferees have been unable to agree. The House conferees felt that they were instructed by the yea-and-nay vote of the House to retain the provision as passed by the House, consequently we report a disagreement on that point, asking for instructions from the House or the appointment of another committee.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. What motion does the gentleman make?

Mr. WELLS. I move the adoption of the report.

Mr. CONGER. I make the point of order that this committee of conference have made no report under the rules. They should either report some agreement or report that they have been unable to come to an agreement.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. As the Chair understands, the committee of conference, in their report, state that the committees of the two Houses have agreed in part and disagreed in part. The requirement of the rule in regard to furnishing a written statement to accompany the report and explain the action recommended has been complied with. The gentleman from Missouri now moves the adoption of the report, which would leave those parts on which the committees of conference have disagreed to be settled by further conference.

Mr. WELLS. I will state that the Senate have not acted on this conference report; and they may recede from the position they have taken upon the question on which the conferees have been unable to agree. I think it important the report should go to the Senate for its action.

Mr. CONGER. I do not know that there is any conference report which the House can accept unless it reports an entire agreement or disagreement.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks there are many precedents where the House has accepted reports of conference committees agreeing in part and disagreeing as to the remaining matters in dispute. The Chair knows of no rule which would deny to the House the power to accept such a report. He thinks that this report of the committee of conference is in order; but should it be adopted, the two Houses will only stand agreed upon such matters as the committees of conference of the two Houses have united upon. The other matters will still be left pending between the two Houses.

Mr. WELLS. I call the previous question.

The previous question was ordered, and under the operation thereof, the report was adopted.

Mr. WELLS moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WIDOW OF REAR-ADMIRAL PAULDING.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up Senate bill No. 1802, which provides for granting a pension of $50 a month to the widow of Rear-Admiral Paulding. She is now seventy-three years of age; and, though her husband entered the service at eleven years of age, and died after the close of our recent war, through which he served faithfully, she was left with less than $5,000 upon which to live. I ask the bill may be considered and passed, that for the few remaining years of her life this venerable woman may thus be benefited.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill indicated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. REAGAN. If it leads to no debate, I will make no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. No. 1802) granting a pension to Ann M. Paulding.

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Ann M. Paulding, widow of Hiram Paulding, late senior rear admiral, United States Navy, and pay her a pension at the rate of $50 per month.

Mr. HATCH. Has that bill been before the Committee on Invalid Pensions of this House, or is it upon the Calendar?

Mr. KELLEY. It passed the House at the last Congress.

Mr. COVERT. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania will permit me, I will say that the bill is on the House Calendar. It was, however, considered by the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. KELLEY. A similar bill, in fact, in precisely the same terms, has been considered by that committee. This Senate bill is in precisely the same terms as that reported by the House committee.

Mr. HATCH. Has the bill been before the committee in the House and favorably considered?

Mr. KELLEY. It has.

There was no objection, and the House Calendar was discharged from the further consideration of the bill; and it was taken up, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. KELLEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NAVY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ATKINS. I send up a report from the committee of conference, which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill of the House No. 6969, making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 4, 5, and 9.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 8, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 3, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: Strike out the word "fifty" and insert in lieu thereof "twenty-five;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 7, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert $875,000; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 10, and agree to the same with amendments, as follows: Insert after the word "statutes," at the end of line 2, the words "as heretofore amended." Strike out the word "sixteen," in line 4, and insert in lieu thereof the word "fifteen;" and the Senate agree to the same.

J. D. C. ATKINS,
THOMAS R. COBB,
FRANK HISCOCK,
Managers on the part of the House.
WILLIAM WINDOM,
H. G. DAVIS,
R. E. WITHERS,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. CONGER. Let the statement which under the rules should accompany the report from the committee be now read by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

The effect of the foregoing report, if adopted, will be as follows:

By amendment 3 the sum of $825,000 is appropriated in lieu of $850,000 as given by Senate.

By amendment 4 $55,000 is appropriated instead of $60,000.

By amendment 5 $1,500,000 is appropriated instead of $1,600,000.

By amendment 7 $875,000 is appropriated instead of $900,000.

By amendment 8 $75,000 of above-named sum is made immediately available.

By amendment 9 $250 is appropriated for two private horses for commanding officer at Mare Island, California.

By amendment 10 sections 1418, 1419, and 1420 of the Revised Statutes are amended to reduce the minimum age at which minors may be enlisted in the naval service to the age of fourteen years.

Mr. ATKINS. If the House desires a brief explanation of these amendments, I can give it in two or three minutes. [Cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. WAIT. The House is perfectly satisfied with the reading of the report and the accompanying statement.

Mr. ATKINS. The gentleman from Michigan asked for an explanation. It remains with the House whether or not it should be made. If it be desired I can give it in three minutes.

Mr. CONGER. I only asked for the reading of the accompanying statement.

Mr. ATKINS. I understand the gentleman from Michigan is satisfied; and if nothing further is desired in explanation, I have no wish to trespass on the House.

The report was adopted.

Mr. ATKINS moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MICHAEL MEENAN, DECEASED.

Mr. MARTIN, of Delaware. I appeal to the House to grant my request. I was absent when my State was called under the Frye rule, the other day, by reason of accompanying a member of this House home who was too sick to go alone. I ask, therefore, the House grant me unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table and concur in Senate amendment to a pension bill, the object of which is to strike out arrears, and to which there can be no objection on the part of the House.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I am entitled to be recognized before the gentleman from Delaware, as I sought the attention of the Chair first.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair listened as well as he could to the gentleman from Iowa and the gentleman from New York.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I addressed the Chair, and my request is simply to have unanimous consent to concur in the amendment of the Senate to a pension bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair in the exercise of his duty under the rule is alternating between the two sides, recognizing a gentleman on one side and then a gentleman on the other. The gentleman from Delaware is now recognized.

Mr. PAGE. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from California insist on his demand for the regular order?

Mr. PAGE. I will yield for this, but then I shall insist upon the demand for the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. No. 2331) granting pensions to the widow and minor children of Michael Meenan, deceased.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This bill is reported from the Senate with amendments. The Clerk will report the amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the word "after," in line 12, down to and including line 13, and insert "the passage of this act;" so that, if amended as proposed, the bill will read:

"That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to place upon the pension-roll, at the rate of $8 per month, the name of Emma Meenan, widow of Michael Meenan, deceased, late a corporal in Company E, Second Regiment Delaware Volunteers, also the names of Mary Meenan, William Meenan, George Meenan, and Edward Meenan, minor children of the said Michael Meenan, deceased, at the rate of $2 each per month; the said pensions to be payable to the parties hereinbefore named, respectively, from and after the passage of this act."

Mr. CONGER. Do I understand that the gentleman from Delaware takes this in lieu of his right under the call of States to present a bill for consent?

Mr. MARTIN, of Delaware. I do, sir.

Mr. CONGER. So the gentleman will not have the privilege before other gentlemen are called in the regular order.

Mr. MARTIN, of Delaware. I will only take my turn in the regular call hereafter.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the Senate amendment.

The Senate amendment was concurred in.

Mr. MARTIN, of Delaware, moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Several members demanded the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There is no motion pending.

Mr. REAGAN. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, to proceed to the consideration of the river and harbor appropriation bill.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I hope the gentleman from Texas will yield to me for a moment.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I also ask consent to offer a bill.

Mr. REAGAN. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] and also to the gentleman from New York [Mr. VAN VOORHIS] to introduce propositions, if there is no debate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair cannot allow any gentleman to take the control of the floor away from the Chair. The Chair has no objection to the gentleman yielding the floor, provided that he alternates between the sides of the House.

Mr. REAGAN. Then I withdraw the motion.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. Then I ask leave to take up for consideration the bill——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will recognize the gentleman in his regular order.

JACOB H. EPPLER.

Mr. SAMFORD. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There is no regular order pending. There is no motion before the House. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] asks consent to take up for consideration at this time a Senate bill the title of which will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. No. 1070) granting a pension to Jacob H. Eppler.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the third reading of the bill. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Jacob H. Eppler, late of Company B, Eleventh Regiment Indiana Volunteers.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The bill was passed.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ELIZA BAILEY.

Mr. POEHLER. I ask unanimous consent to take up and pass the bill which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the title of the bill, after which the Chair will ask for objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. No. 1148) granting a pension to Lizzie Bailey.

Mr. SIMONTON. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will again state that there is no regular order, there being no motion pending, except the request for unanimous consent.

Mr. SPRINGER. Would it be in order to have a morning hour now?

Mr. SIMONTON. I wish to state that I objected to the present consideration of that bill.

Mr. BOYD. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. POEHLER. The objection, I understand, is withdrawn to the bill which I have requested to be taken up for consideration.

Mr. SIMONTON. I have not withdrawn the objection.

Mr. REAGAN. If I am permitted to do so I will be glad to yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will again cause the title of the bill to be read, after which objection will be asked for.

The Clerk read the title of the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. No. 1148) granting a pension to Lizzie Bailey.

Mr. POEHLER. This bill is reported favorably from the Committee on Pensions and is on the Calendar of the Committee of the Whole House. I move to discharge the Committee of the Whole House from its further consideration, and that it be put upon its passage.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There being no objection to the present consideration of the bill, the question is on its engrossment and third reading.

Mr. SIMONTON. I have been steadily objecting to its consideration.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understood that the gentleman had withdrawn his objection.

Mr. SIMONTON. I have not withdrawn it.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. REAGAN. Then I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to proceed with the consideration of the river and harbor appropriation bill.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 120, noes 8.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I make the point of order that no quorum has voted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The point of order being made that no quorum has voted, the Chair will order tellers, and appoints the gentleman from New York, Mr. VAN VOORHIS, and the gentleman from Texas, Mr. REAGAN.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I shall not insist upon the point of order, and will withdraw it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The point that no quorum voted having been withdrawn, the motion is agreed to. The gentleman from Texas now moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. CARLISLE in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of the river and harbor appropriation bill. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. DAVIS.]

Mr. REAGAN. In order that the House may be in possession of all the facts in relation to that, I send to the desk the engineer's report, and ask that the paragraph I have marked be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The river is in fact simply a line of communication through the city, as one of its streets, and which, under municipal direction, may be obstructed to any extent by the erection of bridges or other structures. Traffic on the river and across the river conflict with each other, and questions as to what extent one shall be sacrificed for the other involve purely local interests, and will be settled by merely local action.

In general the interests looking to the improvement of the Chicago River can hardly be received as having any national importance, but as simply local, for securing access to the river, and for constructing an outer harbor to relieve this overcrowded condition, the United States has expended to June 30, 1880, $1,087,713.01, and for further benefit——

Mr. REAGAN. That will do.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I would like permission to say just one word.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] has not expired. Does he yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. REAGAN. I will yield the balance of my time to the gentleman. Let me only say that is the description of the Chicago River furnished by the engineers in a report made last December.

Mr. DUNNELL. Let the pending amendment be reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. DAVIS.]

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 224 insert as follows:

"Improving main branch Chicago River, Illinois, by dredging as suggested in the Engineer's report, transmitted to the House by the Secretary of War, under date of December, 1880, $20,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DAVIS] has two minutes yielded to him by the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I only wish for a single word. I desire to place against this officer's opinion, that this is not of national importance, the opinion expressed by such men as Benton, Webster, and like statesmen who regarded the Chicago River, Illinois Canal and Illinois River as of national importance, and as the natural and national thoroughfare and connecting link, uniting the great lake system with that of the Mississippi and its tributaries. They spoke and favored its improvement some forty years ago from the fact that it was a national improvement which the Constitution could reach and the Treasury sustain. The nationality of the Chicago Canal and of course the harbor at its mouth is by no means a new conception to me, said Benton. I do not wish to say more in reply to that part of this officer's report.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Illinois. I would like to inquire what that document is that was read by the Clerk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas announced it was the report of the engineer.

Mr. REAGAN. Let the Clerk give the name and date.

The Clerk read as follows:

OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF ENGINEERS UNITED STATES ARMY,
Washington, D. C., December 11, 1880.

Signed by G. J. Lydecker, major of United States Army.

Addressed to Brigadier-General H. G. Wright, Chief of Engineers United States Army.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Illinois. Is that in the published report?

Mr. REAGAN. It is not.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Illinois. Well, I should think not. It does not sound much like a public report.

Mr. REAGAN. It is a report sent by the Chief of Engineers to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Illinois. How did the gentleman from Texas get that report?

Mr. REAGAN. It came addressed to the committee by the Chief of Engineers, at whose request I am not advised; but it came into our hands from the Chief of Engineers.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. That is a report by Major Lydecker, transmitted by the Secretary of War to the Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Illinois. There is a general disposition, it seems to me, to cut off the rights of this little village of Chicago. I do not know how the big city of Michigan City and cities of that kind are favored with appropriations to build their inside harbors, and when this small village of Chicago makes a just demand for the same thing something is gotten up to set it aside. This city has been making its improvements upon the inside harbor and river there and I do not think it is fair to set aside its demands for an improvement which has been granted to so many smaller places. I simply ask for fair play.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is not in order.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Illinois. I have got five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has not got five minutes.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Illinois. He seems to have it, anyway.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DAVIS] occupied five minutes in support of the amendment and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] obtained the floor for five minutes in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. FROST. I move to strike out the last word, and yield my time to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. ALDRICH.]

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois want to address the committee?

Mr. ALDRICH, of Illinois. I have been trying to find out who this distinguished gentleman is. Gentlemen all around me keep asking who he is, and I am not able to tell them exactly who he is. I do not think it is a fair thing on the part of the Committee on Commerce to introduce a statement of that gentleman in the way this has been introduced. I do not think it shows a disposition on the part of the Committee on Commerce to do a fair thing by my city. It is time that the West, as the distinguished gentleman from Colorado remarked, should stand together and have a fair show and see if this Committee on Commerce cannot be made to do us justice.

Mr. HAZELTON. Get a mandamus on them.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Illinois. I want to know if I have the floor?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois will proceed.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Illinois. That is what I am trying to do, but I am constantly interrupted. All these honorable gentlemen around me know that this amendment is reasonable and just, and I hope this committee will agree with me that it should pass. There is a gentleman here who has expressed a desire to speak on this question; he knows that it should pass. I yield to him [Mr. FROST] for two minutes.

Mr. FROST. I am very much obliged to the gentleman fron Illinois [Mr. ALDRICH] for returning to me a small portion of the time that I yielded to him. I desire to say that, appreciating keenly as I do and as my colleagues do the fact that Chicago is, as the gentleman has described it, a somewhat important village, a sort of appendage to the city of Saint Louis, we are all very much in favor of any proposition which will redound to the benefit of the city of Chicago.

Having heard from the gentleman of the Illinois delegation and from the Representatives from the city of Chicago that this measure is desired by the inhabitants of that city, as was shown to-day by the telegram which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DAVIS] had read to the House, I hope this amendment will be agreed to as being one of importance to a city which would to-day be the foremost city of the West if the city of Saint Louis did not stand in its way. [Laughter.]

Mr. ALDRICH, of Illinois. I would like now to yield five minutes to my colleague from Illinois, [Mr. DAVIS.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to say——

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I want to state this: I am responsible for having this report brought before the House; I quoted from it myself.

Mr. REAGAN. That is a part of what I wanted to state. The gentleman from Illinois who last spoke [Mr. ALDRICH] seemed to think that the Committee on Commerce was at fault somewhat in introducing a report here which should not have been brought in, and he did not seem to know who Major Lydecker was. I desire to state that this report comes from a major of engineers of the United States Army, made to the Chief of Engineers, and sent by him to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and by the Speaker transmitted to the Committee on Commerce, and I would not have acted in good faith to the House if I had not asked the House to hear what that engineer said.

Mr. FROST. I withdraw my formal amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. DAVIS.]

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. And I ask that the vote be taken by division. I wish to see who will vote $20,000 for the Little Kanawha and nothing for the Chicago.

The question was taken upon the amendment of Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois, and upon a division there were—ayes 56, noes 73.

No further count being called for, the amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read the following:

Improving Cape Fear River, North Carolina, $10,000.

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. I move to amend the paragraph just read by striking out "$10,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$25,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary to preserve and maintain existing improvements and continue the present dredging operations." This amendment is only to carry out the recommendation of the engineers. The town of Wilmington is the largest shipping point in North Carolina, the most important port in that State. I yield the remainder of my time to my colleague from that district, [Mr. RUSSELL.]

Mr. RUSSELL, of North Carolina. It will be observed that this amendment does not necessarily increase this appropriation one dollar. It is in the interest of economy. It is to preserve and protect a work already completed, or approaching completion, on which has been expended by the Government more than one million dollars. This work has cost the Government of the United States eleven hundred and thirty odd thousand dollars. The engineer in charge of the work in his report asks simply that a sufficient amount shall be appropriated by this Congress to preserve the work already done and to protect the work upon which this vast sum of money has been expended. The work itself has been liberally dealt with by the country owing largely to the fact that we have been fortunate enough to have one of our Senators as chairman of the Committee on Commerce at the other end of this Capitol. [Laughter.] To him this liberality is to be largely attributed.

Here is the language of the engineer, to which I invite the attention of members of this House:

No sum is asked for the ensuing year beyond what is required for the operation of the dredge and the contingencies which may always arise in a work of such magnitude as this, where the hurtful effect of violent gales may be expected to a greater or less extent every year.

That is, he asks for $25,000 in case that amount is needed. That is all the engineer asks. He says that is necessary to preserve a work upon which you have already expended this vast amount of money.

I believe that the distinguished gentleman from Texas himself, [Mr. REAGAN,] whose patriotic motives and purposes and services are in my opinion entitled to the highest commendation, would not be opposed to this amendment but for the fact that he and those who are engineering this bill regard all amendments as dangerous to the success of their measure. The amendment itself is meritorious; it is in the interest of economy. It asks no increase of appropriation unless this work should be carried away by some violent gale during the year. It would be the grossest extravagance, I submit, if we should refuse to adopt this amendment under the circumstances.

The question being taken on the amendment, it was not agreed to; there being ayes 35, noes not counted.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Currituck Sound, Coanjok Bay, North River and Bar, North Carolina, $30,000.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. I move to amend the paragraph just read by striking out $30,000 and inserting $15,000. I will state my reason for offering the amendment. I find in the report of the engineer——

Mr. O'NEILL. Never mind giving us the reason; let us vote.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, there are more "injudicious friends" of this bill than are represented in this book. On page 828 of the report I find that the estimate of the engineers for this improvement is $20,000. Now, I understood from the chairman of the Committee on Commerce that the estimates of the engineers had been reduced one quarter or thereabout.

Mr. KENNA. Will the gentleman allow me to correct his statement?

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. I cannot yield. I have made no statement except the statement here in the report of the engineer.

Mr. KENNA. There is another report, which the gentleman has not at his command, I presume, or he would not make the statement that he does.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. The estimate here is $20,000. Now I propose to cut it down in about the proportion indicated by the chairman of the Committee on Commerce; that is to make the amount $15,000.

Mr. YEATES. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Iowa is entirely mistaken about the estimate. This item embraces four different places; let me read it:

And the estimate is $70,000.

Mr. KENNA. That is right.

Mr. YEATES. Now let me tell the gentleman that from 1860 to 1880, 91,131 steamers, schooners, and other craft went through that river, as will appear by the following statement:

| Year. | Steamers. | Schooners. | Sloops. | Barges. | Lighters. | Boats. | Rafts. | Total. |

During the year ending September, 1880, there passed through this river 77,568 bales of cotton; 221,245 bushels of corn; 58,178,803 feet of lumber; 30,646,814 shingles; 348,100 staves; besides various other products in large amounts. There is a larger trade there than upon any other of the waters of North Carolina, except at Wilmington.

The amendment of Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa, was not agreed to.

Improving Great Pedee River, South Carolina, $6,000.

Mr. RICHARDSON, of South Carolina. I move to amend by inserting after the words "South Carolina" the words "between Little Bluff and Cheraw." The last river and harbor bill passed by this House appropriated for this river $6,000, which has been expended or is being expended in another part of the river. The amendment I offer provides simply that the amount now appropriated shall be expended between the points named, where it is most needed. I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. REAGAN. There is no objection to that.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Waccamaw River, South Carolina, from its mouth up to Waccamaw Lake, North Carolina, $5,000.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. I move to strike out this paragraph. I read again from the report of the engineers:

The obstructions to navigation consist of overhanging trees and sharp bends. In many places these bends have already been cut off by cutting ditches from one reach of the river to the one below, and allowing the current to wash them out. Only two of these cut-offs are at present navigable, (Sam's and Lawson's,) being too narrow; but they can all be made so, and more cuts made at small expense. Below Red Bluff the river is good to a point about one and a-half miles from Reeve's Ferry, South Carolina, where the Wild Horses commence. The Wild Horses (so called from the crookedness of the river and the swiftness of the current) extend within two miles of Grahamville.

Now, here is a mountain stream with a current so rapid and so crooked that it bears the name of "Wild Horses;" yet the Government of the United States is to undertake to make that stream navigable.

Mr. RUSSELL, of North Carolina. Now, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. UPDEGRAFF] has run against a snag certainly.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. They say the river is full of them.

Mr. RUSSELL, of North Carolina. He has run against a genuine snag. He has demonstrated to this House what might have been suspected before, with all respect to the gentleman—that he does not know what he is talking about. [Laughter.] He says this is a "mountain stream." It is a stream about fifteen or twenty miles from the Atlantic, and running into it. It is three hundred or four hundred miles from any mountain or even a respectable hill. [Laughter.] It is a stream deep enough through most of its length to float the Great Eastern.

A MEMBER. Twelve feet?

Mr. RUSSELL, of North Carolina. Twenty feet—forty feet in places. The appropriation in this bill is, I believe, only $5,000. It ought to be $15,000 or $20,000, upon every principle by which this House should be governed in measures of this sort. This is an interstate stream, being in the States of North Carolina and South Carolina. It connects Waccamaw Lake, one of the most beautiful and useful lakes of this country, with the sea. This river, with a small expenditure of money at the hands of this Government, can be made capable of floating the commerce of nations. Yet the gentleman gets up here and talks about "snags" and "overhanging trees." Why, did it ever occur to the gentleman that the best rivers in this country have snags in them? Did it ever occur to him that the Mississippi River has snags in it? Did it ever occur to him that the Missouri and all the great rivers of the country have "overhanging trees" and "snags," which must be removed to facilitate navigation?

[Here the hammer fell.]

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa, it was not agreed to.

Improving Chattahoochee River, Georgia, $20,000.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. I move to amend by striking out this paragraph. I am not responsible for what these engineers say. I have always regarded them as "injudicious friends." My friends can quarrel with them as much as they please, but I stand by their reports for the present at least.

Now, with regard to the Chattahoochee, from page 1705 of the report of the injudicious friends I read:

The most important element to be considered in connection with the feasibility of this improvement is the amount and distribution of fall to be overcome by locks and dams.

I should think it was, when we read a little further on. It goes on and states there are three hundred and sixty-two feet fall in thirty-four miles to be overcome by locks and dams. That river in thirty-four miles is to be raised by locks and dams three hundred and sixty-two feet. That is only one section of it. I cannot take the trouble to go through the whole of it. Further on it states that a single one of the forty-two locks getting out of order would render the improvement useless for the time being. Further on it says:

The smallest force of lock-tenders that could be expected to work the locks and attend to minor repairs would be four men, each at $1 a day, which for the forty-two places where locks would be required would cost $168 per diem, or $61,320 per annum, which capitalized at 4 per cent. would represent a permanent investment of $153,000.

Further on he says:

The general direction of the river is nearly at right angles to the line which commerce naturally seeks from the great Mississippi basin to the Atlantic Ocean. It is not likely, therefore, to form a link in any through or trunk route.

"It is always to be remembered," in another place it says, "that no advantage whatever will be derived from the money expended until a sufficient length of the river is made navigable to induce private parties to build steamboats and engage in commerce."

The amount estimated to complete the improvement is $1,533,000. But drop the thousands, for I am no small man, I do not care for a few thousands. Drop the thousands, and we have $3,000,000 in round numbers. The Engineer says your appropriation is of no true value until the United States has appropriated for it $3,000,000. This bill appropriates $10,000,000 as a whole. There is for this river Chattahoochee the sum of $20,000. Now, as $20,000 is to $3,000,000, so is the amount of this bill to the whole amount which the United States must shoulder by passing it. If you will make a calculation, if this bill is upon a correct basis and this appropriation is a fair criterion to judge by, the passage of this bill puts the United States in a situation of becoming responsible for $1,500,000,000, and your appropriation is not worth a peg. [Cries of "Vote!"] If you are not satisfied with it, go on and make your own figures. The estimates of your engineers justify every word I say in the matter.

Mr. REAGAN. The gentleman from Iowa has run on another snag. I will read from the official report:

The present project for the improvement of this river was adopted in 1873, the object being to afford a channel one hundred feet wide and four feet deep at low water from the mouth of the Chattahoochee to Columbus, Georgia.

The estimate is $50,000. The committee allowed $20,000. It is true, sir, there is a speculative report for slack-water navigation far above Columbus; but that was objected to by the committee. And we propose to improve a large river, one of the large rivers of this country, the boundary between Alabama and Georgia down in the low country, from Columbus down, no slack-water at all, no million dollars in it, $50,000 being estimated and $20,000 recommended by this bill.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Another snag removed.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. I move to strike out the last word.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it has been charged here I did not read from the correct report. I could not hear exactly what the gentleman from Texas said; but I hear what his colleagues say behind me. I have a report here, and I read from pages 1705 and 1707. If that be not the report, then I do not know what is. It is a survey of the Chattahoochee River above Columbus, Georgia.

Now, as part of my remarks, I ask to have read from the New York Tribune——

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. We are appropriating below.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. There is nothing in the bill which designates any part of the river to be appropriated for.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. It says continuing.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. "Improvement of the Chattahoochee River, Georgia, $20,000." Those are the only words.

As a part of my remarks, I send to the Clerk's desk a speech made last summer by a gentleman to his constituents, which will be found in the New York Tribune of the date designated.

Mr. REAGAN. I hope that will not be done.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has a right to put anything in his speech which is parliamentary and respectful.

Several MEMBERS. Print.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. No, I want it read.

The Clerk read as follows:

[From the New York Tribune, July 10, 1880.]

SOLID FOR BIG APPROPRIATIONS.

(From a recent speech by Georgia's new Senator, JOSEPH E. BROWN.)

We have had to abandon one of our old creeds. Before the war we were utterly opposed to internal improvements by the General Government as now practiced. We took none of the money; we took the honors and the North always got money at every Congress. It turned out when the struggle came that the money weighed a great deal more than the honors did. [Laughter.] In the future we must change that policy. We pay our part of the money necessary to run this Government and we are entitled to our part when it comes to a division. Our rivers and harbors need improvement as do their rivers and harbors. But we need it the most because they have long had the advantage. When we go up there hereafter we must go earnestly and honestly and faithfully for the old flag, but we must ask for the appropriation also. [Laughter and applause.] And, gentlemen, from what I have seen during the short period of my service, if we meet the Northern Senators and Representatives in the proper spirit, they are ready hereafter to give us our part and make a fair distribution. We ought to encourage it. We ought to take our share in every improvement; and especially to urge them to make such appropriations of the proceeds of the public lands as will give us for the time the lion's share, because we have the heavy task here that they do not have there, of educating the colored race. This is right, and it is what we should contend for. [Applause.]

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Chairman, it will be observed that this is a fast age, and the gentleman has caused to be read a letter dated July 10, 1881, from the New York Tribune.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. That was evidently an error in the reading. It should be 1880. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. STONE. I offer an amendment to come in after line 447.

The clerk read as follows:

At the end of line 447 insert:

"For improving mouth of Grand River, Michigan, from its mouth to Grand Rapids, $25,000."

Mr. STONE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to state that I have not opposed the passage of this bill. I am in favor of the bill and voted for it as reported from the committee. I make this amendment in good faith and with the hope that it will be adopted by the committee. In the last river and harbor appropriation bill authority was given to the Secretary of War to have a survey of Grand River made. This survey has been made at an expense of about three thousand dollars, and a favorable report from the engineer in charge, recommending that an appropriation be made, has just been sent to the Secretary of War. It came too late for the use of the committee. It is not necessary for me to say that Grand River is the largest river in the State of Michigan. Grand Rapids, the point at which we desire to improve the river, is forty miles from the mouth of the river and the second city in size and importance in the State. This bill provides an appropriation of $50,000 for the improvement of the harbor at the mouth of the river. I shall expect the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. UPDEGRAFF] to vote for this amendment because there is no question about the navigability of Grand River. It has been navigated for upward of fifty years. In 1870 the Supreme Court of the United States so decided its navigability in the case to which my colleague [Mr. CONGER] referred this afternoon—the case known as "The Daniel Ball." A question arose as to whether vessels navigating this river were required to obtain license. In that case the court uses this language. I quote from 10 Wallace, 564. Speaking of the true doctrine to apply to this river, Justice Field says:

If we apply this test to Grand River, the conclusion follows that it must be regarded as a navigable water of the United States. From the conceded facts in the case the stream is capable of bearing a steamer of one hundred and twenty-three tons burden, laden with merchandise and passengers, as far as Grand Rapids, a distance of forty miles from its mouth in Lake Michigan. And by its junction with the lake it forms a continued highway for commerce, both with other States and with foreign countries, and is thus brought under the direct control of Congress in the exercise of its commercial power.

That power authorizes all appropriate legislation for the protection or advancement of either interstate or foreign commerce, and for that purpose such legislation as will insure the convenient and safe navigation of all the navigable waters of the United States, whether that legislation consists in requiring the removal of obstructions to their use, in prescribing the form and size of the vessels employed upon them, or in subjecting the vessels to inspection and license in order to insure their proper construction and equipment.

I hope the amendment will be adopted. I cannot consume further time in the discussion of it, but submit the matter to the judgment of the committee, hoping that there will be no objection to it as a matter of right.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 55, noes 68.

Mr. STONE. Mr. Chairman, as I made this amendment in good faith I ask for tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman make the question of a quorum?

Mr. STONE. I do not wish to obstruct legislation. I make no question of a quorum, but I ask for a vote by tellers on the amendment.

Tellers were not ordered.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Flint River, Georgia, $15,000.

Mr. HAZELTON. I move to strike out the entire appropriation in this section contained in lines 450 and 451.

The House, I am sure, Mr. Chairman, will take cognizance of the fact that I have not in any way undertaken on this bill either to advance or impede its progress. It came to us from the Committee on Commerce, and so far as my own district and State are concerned, I believe our delegation stand here to-day in favor of the bill substantially as presented. But in the progress of this debate I have noticed on the part of the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. MCLANE,] and perhaps he is the only man in the democratic party—I think he is—from its organization down to this time, who has ever claimed or will claim that the policy of improving the rivers and harbors of this country, as contemplated in this bill, had its authority originally with the democratic party; and it is because, perhaps, outside of this debate, he has undertaken to appropriate that glory, if there is any glory in it, that I call his attention to a few remarks that I may address to this point on this occasion.

If I understand the history of this kind of legislation we obtained it far back in the history of the whig party, and especially under that glorious old statesman, Henry Clay. I take up this book, which is a history of all internal improvements in this country, and I turn to the veto message on this very kind of legislation interposed by President Polk, in 1846, and read:

The Constitution has not, in my judgment, conferred upon the Federal Government the power to construct works of internal improvement within the States, or to appropriate money from the Treasury for that purpose. That this bill assumes for the Federal Government the right to exercise this power, cannot, I think, be doubted. The approved course of the Government, and the deliberately expressed judgment of the people, have denied the existence of such power under the Constitution. Several of my predecessors have denied its existence in the most solemn form.

The gentleman from Maryland is familiar with what I have read. It but declared the doctrine of the democratic party at that time and down to a very late date.

There has not been one declaration to the contrary in the long line of democratic Presidents, in the long line of democratic platforms. There has not been one declaration to the contrary of this proposition which I announce here as having come from Henry Clay and adopted by the republican party. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"] No, you do not want to vote yet. The only way it seems for a man to make himself popular is to talk all the time and call for a quorum and interpose objections and amendments. [Laughter.]

Now, let us go back to the democratic platform of 1856, and I call the attention of my old friend from Maryland, whose life runs far back into the history of this nation, to what I now cite from that platform:

That the Constitution does not confer upon the General Government the power to commence and carry on a general system of internal improvements.

That was part of the platform accepted by Buchanan and that was the platform that my friend from Maryland made speeches for and voted for and stood up for, at the time it was adopted and ratified by the vote of his party. Now, in order that I may throw a little light down through his heart, in order that I may make him happy on this occasion, in order that I may call his attention to the record of this party that built all there is in this Government of improvement and of freedom, I invite his attention to our platform of the same date. When I say our platform I of course mean the platform of the republican party.

Mr. PAGE. I move to strike out the last word, and yield my time to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman from Wisconsin proceeding?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAZELTON. This is from the republican platform. It is like the Sermon on the Mount. [Laughter.] It is magnificent; and we have never deviated from it. Your great and venerable Henry Clay, sir, was the friend and advocate of the doctrine and among the first to proclaim it, and I want this engraven on the heart of the gentleman from Maryland that he may take it down to the grave with him: "That appropriations by Congress for the improvement of rivers and harbors of a national character"—[laughter]—

A MEMBER. Skip that.

Mr. HAZELTON. "Required for the accommodation and security of our existing commerce are authorized by the Constitution and justified by the obligation of Government to protect the lives and property of its citizens."

Now, I say right here that I challenge the gentleman from Maryland, with his memory ranging far back, from all the investigation he can make, to bring one platform of his party from its birth down to this hour that ever declared or intimated that principle. Let him produce one—just one! [Laughter and applause.] I withdraw my amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improvement of Flint River, Georgia, $15,000.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. I move to strike out the paragraph just read.

Now, if any man thinks I have obstructed the passage of this bill, he simply mistakes me. I have not sought to occupy the time of this committee. [Laughter.] I have talked but very little. Not half the time when I have moved amendments, have I occupied the time allotted to me by the rule. I am as willing to work on this bill as any man in this House. I make the point of no quorum on no occasion. I am as anxious to get through with this bill as the chairman of the committee who reported it can be. And if any man says I have obstructed the passage of this bill in a factious manner, he is badly mistaken. I have only exercised the right in good faith to call the attention of the country to the reports of the "injudicious friends" of this measure; to the statements made in these "injudicious" reports; and I intend to continue to do it as long as it seems to be my duty, and I have the strength to do it.

Now, as to this amendment. I am not able—and it is perhaps fortunate that I am not able—to appeal to the friends of this measure on the ground that "I voted for the suspension of the rules and therefore you ought to support me; I belong to the ring; gentlemen, don't you know me?" I cannot say that. I did not so vote. I offer this amendment on its own merits, and all I want to say in support of it is simply to read an extract from the Engineer's report. This is in relation to Flint River, Georgia:

The project adopted for this portion of the river was to remove snags and overhanging trees so as to give a navigable channel through a distance of seventy-seven miles for light-draught steamers when the water was a little above the low-water stage.

A little above the low-water stage! In other words to give a channel for light-draught steamers in high water. That is what it means.

The estimated cost of the work as now carried on would therefore be $190,000.

That is what the appropriation for Flint River means. That is what the appropriation of $15,000 means. It means an appropriation of $190,000 and added to that the injuries which the water, weather, and time will make to the work as it is progressing.

Mr. KELLEY. I rise, as the gentleman said, not to consume the time of the committee, but to ask him a question. I want to know how much the gentleman wants for his district, so as to determine whether it might not be a matter of economy to give it to him at once. [Laughter.]

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. I am glad that one of the friends of this bill has placed it on its proper basis, that it is supported only by those who have had a "slice of the pork." [Laughter.]

Mr. KELLEY. Would not $40,000 for an ice harbor have made you a defender of the whole bill?

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. I cannot say it would.

Mr. KELLEY. Do you say it would not?

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. I have not put it on that basis. I have been waiting for the friends of this measure to put it on that basis, and they have done so at last, as I was sure they would.

The question was taken upon the motion of Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa, to strike out the clause, and it was not agreed to.

The Clerk read the following:

Improving Oconee River, Georgia, $2,500.

The Committee on Commerce recommend that the paragraph be amended by adding to it the following:

Of which sum $1,500 to be expended between Dublin and Oconee Bridge.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following:

Improving Oostenaula and Coosawattee Rivers, Georgia, $1,000.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. I move to strike out that paragraph. I desire to say that I am glad we are getting on solid ground and have come to an understanding. This bill is now, I suppose, understood to be a divide. Now as a divide it is unfair. I would have preferred to have got along on some other ground if we could have found any, but we could not find any. We now know what this bill is; it is a divide, and as a divide it is not fair.

Now in regard to Oostenaula River the Engineer says:

The Oostenaula is a small mountain stream, from one hundred to two hundred feet in width, with rapid current and short bends. It is navigable for six months in the year as far as Carter's Landing. The commerce on the river is small, consisting mainly of cotton, lumber, and wheat. It penetrates thirty miles from railroad transportation and furnishes the only means of egress, except by wagons, for a small but rich agricultural country. During the past winter steamers have not navigated it, but the farmers have constructed a kind of flat-boat in which they have floated their produce down to the railroad at small expense. These small barges are either pushed back with poles or hauled back in wagons.

What kind of a steamboat navigation is that, I want to know? Floated down the river in boats and the boats hauled back in wagons! Now, we can measure the character of that stream pretty well.

If I am not correct I would like to have some gentleman correct me, because I am liable to fall into mistakes about these matters. These reports occupy 2,000 printed pages, and they could not be obtained until recently. Even now the maps which ought to accompany them are not accessible. I have been trying for a week, or thereabout, to obtain the maps, but I have not been able to do so. After this bill shall have passed then the reports and maps will go in among the waste paper. We cannot now get any of them. I simply wanted to put on record the character of those streams as described by the engineers. With that I am content.

The motion of Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa, to strike out the paragraph, was not agreed to.

The Clerk read the following:

Improving Apalachicola River, Florida, $1,500.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. I move to strike out this paragraph. The engineers say with respect to this river:

The present commerce on this river is insignificant when compared with its former proportions.

Now, mark you:

The diminution is due to railroad competition and the shallow outlet at Apalachicola.

I find on the same page of the reports a description of Apalachicola Bay; and I find in this bill an appropriation for Apalachicola Bay, for the purpose of removing the bar at the mouth. Now, that appropriation will answer all purposes and leave the river navigable, and there is needed no further appropriation.

The engineer says that the commerce upon this river is insignificant on account of the railroad and of the bar. The appropriation for removing the bar will leave the river all right.

Mr. REAGAN. I want to suggest to the gentleman that I appreciate the disadvantage which members labor under in not having these reports, and in not knowing exactly what is before the House. Many of these surveys have extended far up the river, beyond the portions which these appropriations are intended to improve.

I think if the gentleman knew what were the grounds of action of the Committee on Commerce, he would see that the appropriations contained in this bill do not apply to most of the parts of rivers to which his criticism has been extended. The engineer, in his report, says that the project for improving this very river was adopted in 1874, and was intended "to afford a good navigable channel six feet in depth from its mouth to its head."

I need not read more; but that is the information upon which we have acted. This is a large river with a channel which can be made six feet deep, so far as we propose to appropriate for the river.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I move to amend by inserting the following as a new paragraph:

The President of the United States is hereby authorized to appoint a commission of three engineers, one to be selected from the Army Corps of Engineers, the other two to be appointed from civil service, one of whom shall be appointed on the recommendation of the New York Chamber of Commerce, and the other on that of the New York Maritime Exchange, to consider to what extent the full proposed opening of Hell Gate will effect and shoal the channel over Sandy Hook bar, of New York; and said commission is to report their conclusions to the War Department within three months of the passage of this act, and until said report is made no part of the money appropriated by this bill shall be expended by the Engineer Department for the works at Hell Gate.

Mr. Chairman, it has been asserted on this floor by one of my colleagues that the improvement of Hell Gate is going to be very damaging to navigation at the Sandy Hook bar. In view of this statement, it is worth our while to look into the matter before we expend $200,000 more in improving Hell Gate.

Mr. REAGAN. It is only necessary to say that the great work at Hell Gate has been for years under the supervision, control, and direction of the ablest engineers in the United States; and there is no need for such an amendment as this.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. This amendment does not stop the work at all; it only prevents the use of this appropriation until the engineers have made an examination and report.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Choctawhatchee River, Florida and Alabama, up to Newton, $7,000.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. I move to strike out this paragraph. I will consume no time in discussing the question but will simply read a few lines from the report of the engineer:

To improve this section of the river from Newton to Geneva for navigation by light-draught boats during the season of high-water, lasting about six months during each year, besides the removal of snags and logs, the construction of three locks and dams will be necessary. The cost of the whole improvement is estimated at $78,500. The probable commerce to be benefited by this improvement being comparatively small and naturally passing over the lower portion of the river to reach a market, I would respectfully recommend that it be deferred until the river below Geneva is completed.

Now, I am not able to say whether this section of the river is intended to be included in this bill. If not, it was an oversight on the part of the committee to omit to exclude it; for the bill appropriates $7,000 to the river generally. I move that the provision be struck out.

Mr. SAMFORD. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. UPDEGRAFF] makes the same mistake in his strictures on the Choctawhatchee River which he made a few minutes ago in dealing with the Chattahoochee. He reads from the report of the engineer as to that part of the river between Geneva and Newton. This is only a small part of the river.

Now, sir, if he were informed he would know that the Choctawhatchee is a very important stream. It is about two hundred miles in length, extending from a point in Alabama entirely through the west end of Florida. A regular line of steamers now make regular trips on it, and with a sufficient amount appropriated it would at once become one of the principal navigable rivers of the country.

The gentleman moves to strike out the small sum allowed by the committee; that I will never consent to if by any parliamentary means I can prevent it. And I ask this House to vote down his amendment.

Not only do I resist his amendment, but I shall offer one to increase the amount to $20,000. Every amendment offered here increasing the amount has been voted down. And it is now late at night, but I still hope this instance may be an exception. Why not, Mr. Chairman, give a sufficient amount at once? This way of expending small amounts annually is poor economy. If we can have a liberal amount at once the river can be cleared out entirely and be off the books.

The engineer's report shows that annually 25,000,000 cubic feet of lumber and an equal amount in value of other commerce seek an outlet down this river. And indeed there is no other way to market except by hauling in wagons forty or fifty miles.

The report only asks for $20,000, but I will remind the House that that estimate was only for the short portion above Geneva.

The amendment of Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa, was not agreed to.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. Now, Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. SAMFORD] offers the amendment he has indicated, I wish to submit one which he will no doubt accept. It is to add after the word "dollars" this proviso:

Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended between Newton and Geneva.

The adoption of this amendment will relieve us of the whole trouble about this matter, if the gentleman's statement is correct.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. SAMFORD. I move to amend the pending paragraph by striking out "$7,000" and inserting "$20,000," so as to make the appropriation $20,000.

The amendment was not agreeed to

Improving Suwanee River, Florida, $3,000.

Mr. DAVIDSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out "three" and inserting "five," so as to make the appropriation for improving the Suwanee River, Florida, $5,000. I do not wish to delay for a moment the passage of this bill, which, I hope, will soon become a law. But in justice to my constituents, and as a duty which devolves upon me, I have offered this amendment. I know not why the committee was induced to recommend only $3,000 for the Suwanee River. I believe the improvements of that stream and its commerce justify the amount which I have asked for, and I hope it will be adopted. I trust there is no gentleman on this floor who has so little music in his soul as that he will oppose this small increase on the Suwanee River.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. DAVIDSON. I have another amendment to offer, which I hope will not be so unfortunate.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "dollars," in line 472, add the following: "Improving Withlacoochee River, Florida, $10,000."

Mr. DAVIDSON. In the appropriations proposed by this bill I notice that the lumber interests, the coal and iron interests, and the manufacturing interests of the country are all remembered. I now ask that in this appropriation the great fruit interest of Florida shall be remembered, and that Florida, which has been so much overlooked in past years in the river and harbor appropriation bills, may now be granted something. I trust that the work on this historic stream, the Withlacoochee, will not be neglected.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Noxubee River, Mississippi, $3,000.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out that paragraph. I will read simply from the Engineer's report. The engineer says in reference to this river that—

With the exception of a few shoals the principal obstructions to the navigation of the river are snags, drift-logs, fish-traps, and overhanging trees.

He goes on to say:

It is estimated that it would require about sixty-five thousand some hundred dollars for such improvements as will enable light-draught steamboats to navigate the river about nine months in the year; and if the work is undertaken an appropriation of $50,000 is recommended.

He says:

Not only are the citizens of Macon, but also the whole community living near and adjacent to the Noxubee River, deeply interested in the project of making the river navigable as far as practicable for at least a great portion of the year, and I have no doubt that, should work actually be commenced, the Government will receive all the aid that can be reasonably expected from the population living near the river.

He says further:

Some thirty years ago the Noxubee River was navigated by small light-draught steamers. The last one, to the best of my information called the Little Jimmie, sunk in 1853.

He says further, in the same report:

By reference to the accompanying map it will be seen that the total length of the river from Macon to its mouth is sixty-nine and a half miles.

Further on he says:

In looking at the map the course of the river is tortuous and crooked; but with the exception of a few instances where either shoals are or where drift has accumulated, the bends are in almost every instance of sufficient width that, even in a very low stage of water, small steamboats of three or four feet draught, managed with proper care, can be easily piloted around the bends.

He says also that logs have accumulated in the river, and goes on to say that these can be removed far easier than the above-mentioned bed-logs, and as they diminish in number farther down the stream, where they occur only occasionally and where the river increases in width, they form only a part of the obstructions.

The next impediment to a free flow of water are the numerous fish-traps and a few mill-dams. While at Macon I was informed by parties whose information can be relied upon, that there was or would be a bill before the Mississippi State Legislature at its present session to enact a law to have all existing fish-traps and mill-dams in the Noxubee River removed at the cost of the respective owners, and make it a State offense to erect new ones, and so on.

I will not take up the time of the committee with reading further from this report. I have read enough to show the character of the stream it is proposed to improve here.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Tallahatchee River, Mississippi, $3,000, of which sum $2,000 shall be expended on the upper and $1,000 on the lower river.

Mr. MANNING. I suggest to the gentleman in charge of the bill that the language in lines 489 and 490 should be changed so that it will read after the word "reported," in line 489, "above the mouth of Cold Water River to Batesville."

Mr. REAGAN. I have no objection to that.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Tombigbee River above Columbus, Mississippi, $1,000.

Mr. CHALMERS. I desire to offer an amendment after the section just read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For improving the harbor at Grand Gulf, Mississippi, $20,000: Provided, Any contractor or contractors will enter into bond with good security to complete the work necessary to restore that harbor for that amount.

Mr. CHALMERS. I have but little hopes, Mr. Chairman, after having watched the fate of many amendments which have been offered to this bill to-night, that this will be adopted; but I ask the attention of the committee because it introduces a new feature into this bill. The Engineer's report shows that if this harbor is improved according to the original scientific plan it will cost a very large sum. The citizens at that place, however, have expressed their willingness to do it for $20,000, although the United States engineers say it will cost several hundred thousand. I therefore ask that it may be allowed the Secretary of War to make a contract with any persons who will give good security that that improvement shall be made in the harbor and completed at a sum not exceeding $20,000. It will be a good experiment, sir, in view of the fact, as has been shown by many gentlemen who oppose the bill here to-day, that these appropriations going on year after year, and thousands upon thousands of money is wasted, or at least no visible results can be seen by the process of improvement adopted and carried out under the engineer system. I hope the committee will allow the amendment to be adopted, and test the question whether improvement of a harbor on the Mississippi River can be made for $20,000 by the citizens who will enter into a contract for that purpose, while the Government engineers say it will cost many thousands of dollars to do it.

The question being taken on the amendment offered by Mr. CHALMERS, it was not agreed to.

The Clerk read the following:

Improving Bayou Courtableau from Port Barre to Atchafalaya, Louisiana, $7,500.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. I move to strike out the paragraph just read. The engineer with respect to this Bayou Courtableau from Port Barre to Atchafalaya declares:

To remove this bar by dredging would only benefit navigation for one low-water season as the succeeding high-water would cause it to reform. To further insure low-water navigation to Washington with Little Devil Bar, there will be required a lock and needle dam about four miles below Port Barre, and the commercial importance of the stream is deemed sufficient to warrant the additional plans for its construction.

Further on, with reference to this bayou, the engineer says:

The bayou at the low-water stage is very much too small for ninety miles above Washington for navigation, even with the small boats, as it is but one foot in depth in many places, and any deepening of these places would but draw off the water of the pool above and perhaps transfer the position of the shoal, but not in the least increase the depth for purposes of navigation.

The small barges which are at present used can take freight and the steamers can tow them, but for any really useful low-water transportation locks and slack-water navigation will be needed.

The depth on the first ripple below the Lamourie and the Boeuf was but one foot, and its extreme width but forty feet, giving a cross-section area at extreme low water of but twenty-eight feet.

The bed of the bayou has many logs and stumps and some standing cypress and gum trees. There are frequent bridges, all of which have draws for passage of steamers. The depth on the ripples is but one foot at extreme low-water, and in its narrowest place the width is but about twenty feet.

Again he says:

It would not have been of any use if it had been completed, which it never was; as when there was water enough to get to it there was enough to do without it. It now forms a slight obstruction where one corner projects into the channel, but it can be easily removed.

Further on he says:

The cross-section at low water on the bar varies hourly with the washing away of sand in any particular place. The narrowest place at the time of the survey was twenty feet, with a depth of two feet, but the shoalest place was but four inches deep.

I reserve the remainder of my five minutes in case I may require to use it.

The question being taken on the amendment, it was not agreed to.

The Clerk read the following:

Improving Bayou Teche from Saint Martinville to Port Barre, Louisiana, $20,000.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. I move to strike out the paragraph which has just been read. I shall content myself with reading an extract or two from the Engineer's report:

From Leonville to Port Barre, thirteen miles, there has not been sufficient water for navigation within the memory of the oldest inhabitants, except during the extreme high-water of 1874. For these reasons it is not deemed advisable at present to expend any of the appropriation for this year in improving the bayou above Leonville.

The small bars found in this bayou are caused by draining ditches, and some means should be adopted to stop this, and have the drainage ditches run into the swamps instead.

Further on, on page 1167 of the report, with respect to this bayou, the Engineer says:

During the high-water of 1874 flat-boats, loaded with lumber and fencing material, passed down through this channel; but it could only be used at very high water, when the lower willow trees were so covered with water that boats could bend them down and pass over them.

For the greater part of the year only a little stream of water, the drainage of the springs in the bank, finds its way down this channel. Four miles from the Courtableau the bottom of the channel is six feet above low-water in the Courtableau.

Mr. Harrod's survey was not made by way of Barry's Landing, but left the Courtableau about a mile below Washington, passing up the Caron for miles to the head of the Maricoquant, which runs about southward from the Caron. Above this point the Caron is but a rain-water channel, and below its banks are like those of the Courtableau and Teche, of Red River deposit, as are those of the Maricoquant, which from the Caron to the junction of the Teche, four miles from Barry's Landing and nine miles from the Caron, is but a small channel, and at the high water of 1874 it had but four and a-half feet depth on the top of the ridge over which it runs just below the place where it leaves the Caron. It is much overgrown with trees, and there is no chance for any navigation by it. For the nine miles it only consists of a series of pools, except during very high water.

The fall from the fourth mile to the thirteenth in the Teche is but little, but the channel is much obstructed by trees standing in it. At the nineteenth mile the Fusilier enters from the west, and from it comes the entire low-water supply for the Teche.

The only means available to make good navigation of the Teche for the year is to make such dams and locks as are recommended for the Courtableau and, except at high water for slack-water navigation, giving the locks a width of forty-five feet in the clear, so as to allow the passage of stern-wheel boats, but not wide enough to allow side-wheel boats to pass.

[Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa, it was not agreed to.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

Improving Bayou Terrebonne, Louisiana: completing the improvement, $8,800.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Iowa. I move to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. I have not marked the passages in the report in regard to this item, and will pass it.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I ask the gentleman from Iowa to yield for a suggestion.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Iowa. It was not for the gentleman, my colleague, to yield.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognized the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. UPDEGRAFF.] The Chair understood that that gentleman rose to propose an amendment.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Iowa. It was I who offered the amendment, and I desire to proceed.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the Chair will recognize the gentleman who offered the amendment. It is the desire of the Chair to give the preference to the gentlemen who rise to offer amendments.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I know the gentleman from Iowa——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa declines to yield.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Iowa. I think that I can very safely appeal to the House and to its justice to say that from the time that I have had the honor to have a seat in this body I have occupied but very little of its attention. I would not now ask a single moment had it not become apparent to me, as I think it must be to every member who occupies a seat at this time in the House or is within hearing of my voice, that it becomes an absolute necessity that each and every individual who is called upon to record his vote upon this bill should set himself right not only before the House but before the country. And especially do I so desire after hearing the remarks of my able, learned, and venerable friend from the State of Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY,] whose wise counsels I have heretofore followed almost blindly. Only a few moments since, when the attention of the House was called to an amendment offered by my able and distinguished colleague from Iowa, [Mr. UPDEGRAFF,] providing that no money appropriated by this bill should be expended upon any river not navigable, or, in other words, that there should be no expenditure of money on any stream not within the maritime jurisdiction of the United States, the amendment was voted down. Now, I ask whether it is not sufficient to arouse a suspicion in my mind and in the minds of every enemy and every friend of this bill in regard to the influences which are relied upon to pass this measure?

Am I not right in inquiring whether it is not enough to arouse a strong suspicion that we will be called upon when we return to our homes to explain to our constituents why it is that we have supported what may be to a certain extent justly-termed a log-rolling bill? When my friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY,] or when any gentleman from any other State, rises and asks me or my colleague how much the State of Iowa desires, how much she obtains from this bill, if she has had a sufficient share of the "killed hog," I want to say to this House that, so far as I am concerned, you may strike out from this bill, if you please, every appropriation for the Mississippi and the Missouri Rivers, or if you will, you may add a million to that appropriation.

Now, if you will place this bill upon the platform which every respectable and honorable citizen of this country should support, that of improving rivers of a national character, whereby the commerce of the country will be extended and expedited, then I will vote for the bill; but the very moment you begin to show that it is a collection of merely local matters, and that our re-election as members of this House depends simply upon the number of dollars which we may be able to secure for our respective localities, then I think it is time the thing should be stopped, and that we should turn our attention to the improvement of such rivers and harbors as are of a national character. For such a bill I would be willing to vote.

But so long as this bill contains appropriations for the improvement of streams that are absolutely unknown to the maps of the world, I shall vote against it. While I believe this is the case with this bill, that millions are to be expended in the improvement of streams which will add nothing to the commercial facilities of the nation, on that ground and on that alone I shall oppose the bill.

The question was taken upon the amendment of Mr. THOMPSON, of Iowa, and it was not agreed to.

The Clerk read the following:

Removing obstructions from Red River, Louisiana, $10,000.

Mr. ELLIS. I move to insert, after the paragraph just read, that which I send to the Clerk's desk as an additional paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

And the Secretary of War is hereby directed to cause a thorough survey to be made of the mouth of Red River, and a plan for its permanent improvement, to be reported to Congress on or before the first Monday of December, 1881, with estimates of cost; said survey and plan to be paid for out of the unexpended balance already appropriated for the mouth of Red River.

Mr. ELLIS. Before offering this amendment I submitted it to the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, [Mr. REAGAN,] and it has been accepted by him.

It will be seen that it requires no appropriation of money; it does not increase the appropriations in this bill one dollar. It merely seeks to solve a problem which has very much bothered the engineers at the mouth of the Red River.

Three years ago Congress made a very liberal appropriation for the permanent improvement of that great river, the second commercial river of this country. It is now about to be destroyed by having all of its waters absorbed by the Atchafalaya.

Four miles from the junction of the Red River with the Mississippi River the Atchafalaya makes out of the Red River and flows in a southerly direction, and empties into Atchafalaya Bay, one hundred miles west of New Orleans. Twenty years ago Atchafalaya River was an insignificant stream, not as wide as this Hall, and not more than ten feet deep. To-day it is a stream three hundred yards in width and seventy feet deep at its month.

The Atchafalaya River now absorbs nearly all the waters of the Red River, and unless something is done, and done rapidly, the Red River will no longer empty into the Mississippi River, but will flow down the Atchafalaya and be lost to the Mississippi. Engineers have failed to solve this difficult problem. One set of engineers have reported one plan, and the Mississippi River commission have submitted another plan.

The object of the amendment I have offered is to take from an appropriation already made, and not yet expended, a sufficient amount to cause a thorough survey of the mouth of the Red River and the adoption and report of a plan for the improvement of the mouth of that river. I trust there will be no objection to the amendment.

The amendment of Mr. ELLIS was adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Warrior and Tombigbee Rivers, Alabama and Mississippi, to be expended in the same proportions as the appropriation under the act of June, 1880, $25,000.

Mr. CLEMENTS. I move to amend by inserting after the clause just read the following:

For improving the Warrior River above Tuscaloosa, Alabama, $75,000.

Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment to the river and harbor bill not with any view of impeding its progress or encumbering it for the purpose of defeating it. I offer the amendment in perfect good faith to the bill. I am in favor of the passage of the bill, and believe that it should pass, because in my opinion the water communications and the vast commerce of the country will be greatly benefited thereby.

My amendment applies to one of the most important rivers in Alabama, a river that extends from the mountains of North Albama to the Gulf at Mobile. This river bears upon it to our chief Gulf city the vast agricultural products of a rich valley extending along its whole length. It penetrates the great mineral regions of Alabama. It traverses almost centrally from the northeast toward the southwest through the most productive part of the vast coal measures of the Warrior basin, which greatly exceeds in extent those of both the others in Alabama, namely, the Cahawba and Coosa, embracing, as is the case, an area of more than 3,260 square miles. The width of this basin on the south line exceeds sixty-five miles, and the strata of millstone grit, sandstones, conglomerates, fire-clays, blackband iron-ore, coals, and shales composing it are synclinal from the northeast and southwest toward the Warrior River. As these strata approach the synclinal axis they become quite horizontal, affording exposures of bituminous coals frequently from ten to twenty feet wide in the beds of the creeks tributary to the Warrior River, and often in the river, also extending entirely across them, so that, at low stages of their waters, large quantities of coal have been taken out and sent to market.

It is only within the past few years, and since the completion of the South and North Alabama Railroad, which develops only the eastern part of this coal-field, that an approximation could be made as to the amount of coal contained in it, its quantities ascertained, or the best modes for mining it concluded on. By means of the cuts made for the track of this railroad and those natural ones of denudation made by the creeks tributary to the Warrior River, and by the river's own bed, as also by borings and diggings, there are at present revealed thirteen seams of bituminous coal in it.

Underlying the lowest of these yet discovered there is a thickness of several hundred feet of coal measures wholly unexplored, which, when penetrated, will no doubt add several more to these numbers. The aggregate thickness of the thirteen here given is thirty-five feet, but severally they are of various dimensions, from a few inches to upward of seven feet. Among the entire number exposed one of them measures six feet and upward, three four feet and upward, one five and a half feet, and two three feet and upward in thickness. These are extracts taken from a letter of Professor Gesner, to show the vast extent of the Warrior coal basin. The statement as above made shows the extent of coal on the extreme eastern line of this vast coal-field, which does not compare with the main portion of this basin, through the center of which the Warrior River flows, and to which the coal is synclinal from both sides.

With these improvements of the Warrior River, making it navigable to tugs and barges throughout the year, coal can be transported to the Gulf for fifty cents to seventy-five cents per ton. It can be placed upon the barges at a cost of from $1.75 to $2 per ton. This is the price now paid, I am informed, in some instances for Warrior coal delivered on railroad cars, and as the coal must ascend to the railroads while it would descend to the river, the cost in the latter case would not exceed and might not equal that in the former. The coal by river, then, could be delivered at the Gulf for the use of the steam marine, or for export, at a cost of $2.50 to $3 per ton.

Present quotations at the leading Atlantic and Gulf ports, are as follows: New York, $6.50 to $7.50; Baltimore, $4.65 to $5.50; Mobile, $10 to $12; Havana, $9 to $10, (in gold;) New Orleans, $7 to $9; Galveston, $13 to $15.

From an inspection of these rates, it is evident that the Warrior coal-field, made accessible by the improvement of the Warrior River, would be drawn on to supply the entire Gulf consumption, including the wants of the Navy Department. And in case of war with a maritime power the value to the Government of a coaling station on the Gulf, that can be readily and cheaply supplied at all times without incurring the risk of sea transportation can be readily understood.

If the Warrior River were made navigable from the junction of the Locust and Mulberry Forks to Mobile, it would open up more of the coal resources of Alabama than has been done by all of the railroads now in operation or under construction in this State, as it would penetrate the very center of her largest and most economically to be worked coal-measures.

It remains now to consider the commercial and other interests involved in the proposed work of improvement, to see whether the benefits to be derived from it would be commensurate with its cost.

The Warrior River flows through or between the counties of Walker, Fayette, Jefferson, Tuscaloosa, Hale, and Greene, which had in 1870 an aggregate population of about ninety thousand, and yielded a crop of 40,000 bales of cotton. I am informed that the shipments down this river have averaged 30,000 bales of cotton annually, but for abundance of caution and for illustration I will say 20,000 bales are now annually going down the river and that 10,000 bales are transported by railroad. Taking $50 per bale as an averrge price, the value of the Warrior cotton crop amounts to $1,500,000. I have no means at hand to ascertain the value of shipments made up the river, but it is reasonable to calculate that they will equal in value that of the cotton crop forwarded to market.

This would seem probable from the well-known fact that Warrior Valley produces very little else than cotton, and that this is exchanged for provisions, corn, general merchandise, &c. The total value of Warrior River trade, going both ways, up and down, may then be safely assumed at $3,000,000. The freight charges on this large business are, for cotton transported by river, $1 per bale, and by railroad, $2.50 per bale. As this river is not boatable usually during the first three months of the cotton season, and as cotton begins to move to market the latter part of August, it follows that the planter is compelled to submit to the enormous charges of the railroad or withhold his cotton from market, and as a general thing they are under such pecuniary necessities as compel them to place a portion of their crops in the market at an early date. It will be seen that one-third of the crop goes by rail. The charges on return freight or up freight will average about four dollars and fifty cents or five dollars per ton, and the tonnage is estimated at about six thousand or eight thousand tons. The whole transportation or freight expense of the Warrior River trade may be taken as follows:

| 20,000 bales of cotton by river, at $1 | $20,000 |
| 10,000 bales of cotton by rail, at $2 | 20,000 |
| 8,000 tons return freight, at $5 | 40,000 |
| Total | 80,000 |

The improvement of the Warrior contemplated by the amendment which I propose will make the river navigable for tugs and barges throughout the year, and would reduce freight charges to fifty cents per bale and $2 per ton, showing a gain of 100 per cent. for profits and incidentals. With tugs and barges the present trade of the Warrior could be done at an expense as follows:

| 30,000 bales of cotton, at 50 cents | $15,000 |
| 8,000 tons return freight, at $2 | 16,000 |

Showing a saving from present cost of $49,000 per annum.

The amendment of Mr. CLEMENTS was not agreed to.

Improving Sabine Pass and Blue Buck Bar, Texas, $150,000.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. I move to amend by striking out the clause just read. I find by the report of the engineers, if I am able to read it aright, that the estimate for this improvement is $114,317. If I am not correct in this statement I will very gladly be corrected. If I am correct I would like to have the chairman of the Committee on Commerce tell me how it is that $150,000 is proposed as the appropriation for this improvement. With the consent of the committee I will modify my amendment so as to move to strike out $150,000 and insert $100,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has the right to modify his amendment.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. One word more before I sit down. Ten million dollars is twenty cents per head for every inhabitant of the United States. For the State of Iowa, with about one million seven hundred thousand inhabitants, it is $340,000. Three hundred and forty thousand dollars of the money of the people of the State of Iowa goes into this bill. Seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars of these appropriations go into the State of Texas. I think I have a right to insist upon this amendment.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the last word. Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to discuss the merits of the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa. I give him great credit for his perseverance and for the great knowledge he has exhibited as to the subjects embraced in this bill. I know he means well. But I say to my friend from Iowa—I call him "my friend" because he is my neighbor, and I have a right to assume that my neighbors are my friends—I say to him that he is wasting the time of this House without benefiting himself, his constituents, or his country. I therefore suggest to him and to the House that he be permitted, by unanimous consent, to review this whole bill by printing all his objections to every clause in it.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. I call the gentleman to order; he is not speaking to any amendment.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. Hear me, my dear friend. [Laughter.] I mean no disrespect at all.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. Very well; I can take care of myself.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I insist upon being heard through. I mean no disrespect at all to the gentleman from Iowa; but I insist that he will accomplish everything he proposes to accomplish by refraining from any further consumption of the time of the House in this discussion.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. I again make the point of order, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman is not speaking to any amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa makes the point of order that the gentleman from Illinois is not addressing himself to any proposition pending before the committee.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. The gentleman from Iowa is not to be the judge of the course of discussion the "gentleman from Illinois" should adopt.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa of course makes the point of order for the decision of the Chair.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, neither the Chair nor the gentleman from Iowa—I mean what I say—neither the gentleman from Iowa nor the Chair can put words into my mouth. I have a right to be heard.

The CHAIRMAN. But the Chair has a right to confine the gentleman within the rules, which requires that a member taking the floor shall address himself to the proposition pending before the committee.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. Exactly; I admit that; but the gentleman from Iowa or the Chair must furnish me with my words, if I am to be confined to their construction of the rules. [Laughter.] Persons differ very much in their modes of expression.

The CHAIRMAN. Why, the gentleman himself stated distinctly that it was not his purpose to speak to the amendment before the committee.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. But the announcement that such was not my purpose did not deprive me of that right. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. Then the gentleman will proceed to address himself to the amendment pending before the committee.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I say to the gentleman from Iowa that I sympathize, I harmonize with many of his objections to this bill; but I am in this position, that I must take the bill as a whole. While I feel that there are many objections which might be urged, I do not feel at liberty to urge them, because in doing so I should lend myself to those whose object it is to defeat the passage of the bill. I cannot do that. I have a district, I have a State, I have a country interested in the passage of this bill; and I will not be used for any such purpose as to defeat its passage.

I ask the gentleman from Iowa to take the course I suggest. His words as uttered here fall unheeded. He will save time and accomplish his object by adopting my suggestion. Let us save our time and the gentleman from Iowa his strength.

Mr. HENDERSON. I wish to say a word in regard to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Iowa. That gentleman has fallen into a great many errors in his opposition to some of the provisions of this bill, for want of the full information which he says he has tried to obtain, but was unable to obtain. Now, in this particular case there was a subsequent report made by the Chief of Engineers to the Committee on Commerce, representing the importance of this work, and that the sum of $200,000 could be expended profitably in its prosecution.

Now, sir, I venture the assertion from the representations made before the Committee on Commerce, that there is not any work before that committee on the Gulf of Mexico and on our Southern coast of greater importance than that one work. I had supposed the remarks of the chairman of the Committee on Commerce the other day had made that sufficiently clear. But there is a subsequent report recommending the sum of $200,000 to be appropriated for the purpose of prosecuting this most important and useful work.

While I am upon the floor, Mr. Chairman, I want to say a little more. My friend has made a great deal of sport here in regard to the Choptank River. He seems to select a name of some peculiarity and then to take it for granted there is something dreadful in regard to that particular work. He ought to have learned long ago there is nothing in names. The Choptank is a river of greater depth than the Mississippi, at least in the upper portion of it in very many places. While it has not the same width, yet it has a regular line of steamers running from Baltimore to Denton on that river doing a considerable amount of business. And then Grand Haven Harbor, which he speaks of, with a few thousand dollars can be made to have a navigable channel of one hundred and fifty feet in width, and eight feet in depth, which is some feet more than the Mississippi River on Rock Island Rapids and some feet more than in some other portions of the river.

If my friend had been a little better informed in regard to many of these measures he would have saved himself and, I think, the committee the trouble which he has given in regard to this matter.

I can say the same with regard to several other improvements which he has made a great deal of sport about and talked about "injudicious friends" and modified mill-dams, where the work is shown, from reports of the engineers, to be of importance not only to the locality in which it is carried on, but to other localities. I feel it only just and right to the committee that I should make these remarks.

Mr. VALENTINE. What is the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. It is to reduce the amount from $150,000 to $100,000.

Mr. VALENTINE. It is for Sabine Pass.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the item.

Mr. VALENTINE. I desire to say that coming as I do from the Mississippi Valley, or rather the Missouri River Valley proper, I believe this Sabine Pass to be the most important to the great West of any on the whole southern coast. I have given it considerable attention and I am prepared to say I believe this appropriation is not too large, but ought to be larger than what is recommended by the committee. I say that, sir, after having given this matter considerable attention, I believe it to be the most important of the outlets on that coast for the great Northwest, which I in part represent on this floor. I have nothing further to say.

The amendment of Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa, was rejected.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. ROBESON. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. I cannot yield now. Mr. Chairman, the member of the Committee on Commerce, the gentleman, my friend who has just taken his seat, charges me with having made many mistakes. He has, however, not proved one. He has studied these books ever since they came out, night and day, and he charges me with having made mistakes, and yet he has not proved one. I only got the book after great trouble and, in the way the old saints went up to glory, through great tribulation. They have had it in the Committee on Commerce all these months. It is not strange I should have made some, but it is strange there is none pointed out save the one by my friend from North Carolina. It is only remarkable I have not made more. I have had 2,000 pages to look over, unindexed and unsystematized. I have always stood ready to be directed, but the gentleman who has studied this book for three months and upward—I do not know how long, but since the session began—has not been able to correct me once.

I said nothing about the Choptank, except what I read from the Engineer's report, and if the name excites a smile, as it does, and as its business would if it were understood differently, I cannot help it, but I am not responsible for it, and I hope my friend from the Committee on Commerce will not feel aggrieved at a simple laugh.

One word further. If I overstep my time a minute or two, I think the committee will not object. I have called the attention of the country and this committee to the character of the streams in this bill. I do not care to consume the time of the House any further in calling attention to the character of these streams. I think I have done my duty in that respect and only my duty. If any man has taken offense at it, I am sorry for it, but I would have done the same had I known he would take offense. I would have felt obliged to do my duty. I am in favor of improving the navigable streams of the country, especially the great interstate streams, but I do say this bill is the greatest enemy to river and harbor improvement that it has been my fortune to meet. I have accepted the law which they have offered, but they have backed out from it. They say the bill only appropriates to streams navigable under the laws of the United States, and I offered to agree to that limit, but they have refused to stand by it.

Again, another member says the streams belong to the United States. I offered an amendment that the appropriations be limited to that, and they backed out of that. They would not consent to it.

I think I have discharged my duty so far as calling attention to the character of these streams is concerned. I believe I will offer no more amendments. I ask leave, Mr. Chairman, to compile these extracts which I have read and others, if I can find time to do so, and print them in the RECORD, with such comments as I may desire to make upon them.

There was no objection, and permission was granted accordingly. [See Appendix.]

The CHAIRMAN. There is a pro forma amendment pending.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. ROBESON. Mr. Chairman, in pursuance of a quasi-understanding which I trust will settle all questions of delay under this bill, I desire to offer an amendment to cover in general terms all that my friend from Iowa has been contending for. In offering this amendment let me say to him and to the committee that, disagreeable as his position may have seemed to himself, and annoying as it may have been to many members who had their wishes set on the completion of this bill, that he has done great service in my opinion to the country and to this House. He has shown many provisions in this bill which should not to be supported by men who have the right execution of the laws of their country at heart. And I honor him for the courage and constancy with which he has taken and maintained his stand before this committee and the country.

I have now sought to embody all the principles for which he has contended in an amendment to this bill, what I think will appeal to the good judgment and honest convictions of every man here; an amendment which embodies all of the principles for which he has contended, and meeting many of the objections which he has presented to these improvements.

I am an advocate of the improvement of rivers and harbors. I would to-day, if called upon in a proper manner, appropriate all the money in this bill for the wise improvement of the Mississippi River alone. I believe in keeping open that great river, which drains a vast region and with its great arteries unites our people and makes us a nation respected and powerful abroad and prosperous at home. If it had not been for the Mississippi River and her dependencies and the present and future interests involved in her free navigation, the Union of our country would hardly have been worth fighting for.

I have no objection to large appropriations for such an improvement as that. It is a duty which we owe to the commerce of the country. But we have obligations before the law. We have duties to our constituencies and our country which control our legislative action, and therefore I offer the following amendment——

Mr. CONVERSE. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. ROBESON. I hope everybody will be in favor of it, and none will oppose it, as it will settle this question definitely. [Laughter and applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio raises a point of order. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CONVERSE. My point of order is that there is no proposition before the committee.

Mr. ROBESON. I move the amendment now.

The CHAIRMAN. The time for debate has expired. The Chair will state that the gentleman from New Jersey was allowed to make his remarks before he submitted his amendment.

Mr. CONVERSE. I would inquire if that is in conformity with the rules of the House?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not; but no objection was made to the gentleman's proceeding. The gentleman will now submit his amendment.

Mr. ROBESON. I will read the amendment myself:

Provided, That whenever the appropriation made by any section or provision of this bill is not in pursuance of a plan reported by the engineer or commission making the survey and estimate, the completion of which will render the river, harbor, or stream sought to be improved of sufficient depth and capacity to float for the length to be improved crafts of at least twenty tons, propelled by steam or sails, then the Secretary of War shall not draw from the Treasury the appropriation made for said improvement until further action thereon by Congress; and shall report to Congress at its next regular session the facts and statistics which in his opinion bring the said appropriation within the provisions of existing law as construed by the decisions of the Supreme Court defining the legitimate objects of national appropriation under the power to regulate commerce given in the Constitution.

Nobody, I imagine, can fairly oppose that amendment. If they cannot accept that they cannot expect us to accept the bill, even though it may include many proper appropriations.

Mr. CHITTENDEN. Mr. Chairman, I have not listened attentively to all the utterances of the gentleman from Iowa. I do not feel competent to advocate the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey as the sum total of all that the gentleman from Iowa has sought to accomplish.

But if I understand the present position of the gentleman from Iowa he has gracefully announced to the committee and to the country that his opposition to the passage of this bill ceases. And if the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROBESON] means to indorse the position of the gentleman from Iowa, I have arisen to second the motion.

I wish in doing this to say one word of justice to the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, and I confidently call the attention of the committee to what I am about to say. The chairman of the Committee on Commerce in introducing this bill made a statement which in my judgment lies at the bottom of this whole business. At any rate it lies at the bottom of this hostility to this bill. He said that ten millions was not too much to appropriate to the water-ways of this country. I believe it is too little. But I believe it is very much less than should be appropriated in this very year; and that is why I so confidently affirm my conviction that it is too late for the Congress of the United States to take care of its rivers and harbors by this process of log-rolling. I do not use that term in an offensive sense. One of the most respectable men who have lived in our country and been connected with its politics—I refer to Mr. Wigthrop, of Boston—has in years gone by made a serious argument that log-rolling was not only necessary in river and harbor bills, but was altogether moral and excusable. That may have been true. I will concede it is true with certain limitations. But it will not do for a people of fifty millions of population, with a hundred thousand miles of railroad, with monstrous water-ways, to be niggardly in this matter. [Here the hammer fell.] I would like to speak two or three minutes more.

Mr. REAGAN took the floor and yielded three minutes to Mr. CHITTENDEN.

Mr. CHITTENDEN. I wish to pass the bill to-night, within the next hour.

I state confidently, and it is no idle word, that our country is too large, that it is too full of resources, developed and undeveloped, for this Congress, composed of three hundred men, to come here and pass a bill on principles which underlie this. I say that I would vote here to-night for the appropriation of $15,000,000 to be put in the hands and under the control of a responsible commission whose business it should be to find where there was a great harbor or a little one that needed to be improved and to improve it. I would not lay a stone here and there that the first great tide should wash away. I would do something to prevent the next freshet from washing Washington away.

I would do something to save the hundreds of thousands of dollars of property, to keep off the malaria, and to preserve the honor and the welfare of the capital of this great country from what has occurred in the past week.

I would go wherever there was a river or harbor, little or big, that might be honestly improved, and I would improve them. And I venture to say now that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. UPDEGRAFF] has opened the door for such measures at some future Congress, not remote, as shall result in the end which I would seek.

I have not quite said what I meant to say in respect to the proposition of the chairman of the committee in regard to the sum of $10,000,000 being a meager and inadequate amount. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Just one minute more. The gentleman said the railroads spend $400,000,000 annually in repairs of their roads. It is ridiculous that while the railroads spend $400,000,000 the rivers and harbors should have but $10,000,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. ROBESON.] The Chair would state to the gentleman from New Jersey that the Secretary of War is directed by his amendment to "retain" the money in the Treasury. The Secretary, the Chair would remind the gentleman, draws his warrants.

Mr. ROBESON. I will modify the amendment to meet the Chairman's suggestion.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I desire to say a single word.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on this amendment is exhausted.

Mr. ROBESON. I wish, before the vote is taken, to insert——

[Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has the right to modify his amendment.

Mr. ROBESON. I wish to insert, before the vote is taken, after the word "engineer," the word "commission."

Mr. O'NEILL. I wish to say Congress can legislate, and Congress does not intend or mean to put this in the power of the Secretary of War. This Congress is capable of legislating.

The question being taken on Mr. ROBESON's amendment, it was not agreed to.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

Improving Cumberland River above Nashville, Tennessee: From Nashville to Kentucky State line, $15,000; from Kentucky line to Smith's Shoals, $15,000; at Smith's Shoals, completing improvement, $10,000.

Mr. SAMFORD. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert after the paragraph just read the following:

"Provided, No money appropriated under the provisions of this bill shall be expended for the improvement of any waters controlled by a private corporation, and for the navigation of which tolls are charged by said corporation."

Mr. WILSON. That has been voted down three times.

The question being taken on Mr. SAMFORD'S amendment, it was not agreed to.

Mr. KEIFER. I want to submit this proposition to the committee—I do not think there can be any reasonable objection to it: that by unanimous consent the further reading of the bill be dispensed with, with the understanding that any gentleman desiring to offer an amendment may offer it as to any portion of the bill remaining unread.

The CHAIRMAN. That can be done only by unanimous consent.

Mr. KENNA. I think there will be no objection.

Mr. PAGE. I object. I have no objection to skipping over any portion of the bill that nobody wants to amend.

Mr. KEIFER. My suggestion is that amendments may be offered to any portion of the bill unread.

Mr. PAGE. Do you mean by that to cut off debate?

Mr. KEIFER. Not at all.

Mr. PAGE. I have no objection to that.

Mr. SPARKS. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made, and the Clerk will proceed with the reading of the bill.

The Clerk read the following:

Improving Tennessee River below Chattanooga, including Muscle Shoals and shoal at Reynoldsburgh, Tennessee and Alabama, $250,000.

Mr. LOWE. I move to substitute "$350,000" for "$250,000" in the paragraph under consideration. This is an appropriation for the improvement of the Lower Tennessee River, including the Muscle Shoals and the shoal at Reynoldsburgh. It is a great work of acknowledged importance, looking to the speedy completion of a grand canal that opens up the whole navigation of that river to the commerce of the adjacent States.

Last year, Mr. Chairman, the appropriation for this canal was over three hundred thousand dollars; and in view of the official estimates of the engineers in charge of the work, I certainly think we should not reduce that amount. We might wisely increase it. This great improvement ought not to be delayed by a spirit of beggarly economy, but, with a progressive and intelligent sense of the public interests, should be completed as soon as practicable. The amendment I offer is within the estimates of the Department.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read the following:

Improving Mississippi River from Des Moines Rapids to the mouth of Illinois River, Illinois and Missouri, $175,000.

Mr. MORRISON. I move to amend by inserting after the paragraph just read that which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

And all sums of money heretofore appropriated for the improvement of the Mississippi between the Illinois and Missouri Rivers and unexpended are hereby appropriated, and shall be applied to the improvement of the harbor and Mississippi River at Alton.

Mr. REAGAN. That amendment does not propose to increase the appropriation, and I have no objection to it.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following:

Improving Mississippi River between the mouths of the Illinois and Ohio Rivers, Illinois and Missouri, $600,000.

Mr. THOMAS. I move to amend the paragraph just read by adding to it that which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read the following:

Out of which sum $50,000 shall be expended in continuing the work at Kaskaskia Bend, and $50,000 shall be expended in continuing work and removing obstructions at the foot of Dickey's Island.

Mr. THOMAS. In view of the record that has been made in this committee, as well in the evening session as during the day, I hardly hope that my amendment will receive the justice that it certainly merits. The Committee of the Whole seems determined to take the report of the Committee of Commerce without change, and that too without regard to whether any improvement which may be proposed has merit or not.

The first portion of my amendment proposes to take of the amount which has been set aside by this paragraph for the improvement of the Mississippi River the sum of $50,000 to prevent the Mississippi River from cutting through its banks into the Kaskaskia. A few years ago these two rivers at the point I have named were 1,200 feet apart. The banks have now been washed in by the encroachment of the Mississippi River until the two streams are within two hundred and ten feet of each other.

If this change is permitted to be made, there will be twenty miles of the worst possible navigation. Certainly no worse navigation could be found between the head and the mouth of the Mississippi River. I ask, then, inasmuch as the appropriation for this purpose will not be increased in the aggregate, that this work, which may not seem to be immediately important, or in the interest of navigation at this time, may now be made, so that in the years to come the Government will be saved the expense of improving that twenty miles of river, which certainly will follow a neglect to do this at this time.

The other $50,000 to be expended at the foot of Dickey's Island is for continuing a work which was begun in 1875. The Mississippi River there encroached upon the peninsula between the Ohio and the Mississippi Rivers, until the city of Cairo was very greatly endangered. Some years ago the Cairo Land Company for the protection of its property built two large dikes at the foot of Dickey's Island. The river has now cut in behind those dikes until they stand exactly in the middle of the river, so that during low water there are only thirty inches of water there, and tow-boats are compelled to break up their tows and take them around these two dikes on the one or the other side.

I now ask that these legitimate and most meritorious appropriations for improvements at these two points may be made.

Mr. CLARDY. I desire to say to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. THOMAS] that it is true as he has stated that the engineer in charge of the Mississippi River between the mouth of the Illinois and the mouth of the Ohio recommends an appropriation for the points mentioned by him. He says further that the appropriation for Kaskaskia, to which the gentleman has alluded, does not seem to be necessary for the improvement of the general navigation of the river.

The Committee on Commerce determined that the whole amount appropriated for this portion of the Mississippi River should be left in charge of the engineer, with a view of allowing him to expend it at such points as in his opinion would best advance the interests of navigation.

Mr. THOMAS. I will ask the gentleman one question. [Cries of "Vote!"] If it has been thought wise by this committee to place all this appropriation at the command of the engineer having the work in charge, then I should like to have him explain to the committee why an appropriation of $10,000 is given to Minton's Point, immediately above this place, which every one knows who has examined it is not a pass so dangerous as this one?

Mr. CLARDY. I will state to the gentleman with great pleasure that in the case of Kaskaskia the engineer says, and the fact ought to be stated, that this work is not now in the interest of general navigation, but is mainly of importance as a protection to private lands. There is no such statement in regard to Minton's Point. That appropriation is insisted on by the Department.

Mr. THOMAS'S amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Mississippi River from Saint Paul to Des Moines Rapids, Minnesota, Iowa, Missouri, Illinois, and Wisconsin, $200,000.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. I move to strike out "two" and insert "three;" so it will read "$300,000." The only change will be in the word "two" to "three." [Laughter.] Here is a stretch of river about five hundred miles long, the greatest river on this continent, the most important river to navigation on this continent. In this stretch of about five hundred miles there occurs some five or six or more through railroad routes from the East to the West. The preservation of this section of the river in a proper condition is of vast importance to the whole Northwest. With that navigation we are able along the line of the Mississippi to place these railroad lines in competition with each other by steamers and flat-boats, so that we have a choice between them. For these reasons and for others which I have not the strength now to enumerate, but which are patent to the whole country everywhere, I ask this appropriation be raised from $200,000 to $300,000.

I want to say in addition that the lower part of the river below the Des Moines Rapids has in this bill about two million dollars, while the upper part, which, under ordinary circumstances, would need a much larger appropriation to keep its navigation in perfect condition, has only this small sum.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I have not during the present session of Congress trespassed upon the attention of the committee or the House, but I confess I begin to feel as the late Governor Williams, of Indiana, once related in this House of a traveler who had stopped at a wayside cabin when the kettle for the evening hasty pudding was over the fire. He said the mother came in and said she did not believe that pudding had been salted, and she threw in a handful of salt. Then the daughter came in and said she did not believe mother had salted the pudding, and she threw in a handful. After a time the old gentleman came in from doing his chores and said he "didn't believe them women had salted the pudding," and he threw in a handful; and as he passed out the stranger got up and said, "If you are all going to salt it, I'll salt it too," [laughter,] and he threw in a handful. Now, Mr. Chairman, if everybody is determined to talk on this bill, I do not know why I should not talk with the rest. [Great laughter.]

I have harbors in my own district as important I trust as those of others, and I would be very glad to have the appropriations for them increased; but I expect my constituents to trust me on practical and impracticable propositions and to discriminate between the two.

Now, I submit to this committee in all good faith that there is power in the House to pass this bill. If it could be defeated that would be another thing, but it cannot be. Good or bad, it is only a question of time when it must pass. I sympathize with the opponents of the bill. There are many things in it which I most seriously object to, but I think the good overbalances the bad, and the injury caused by the failure of a river and harbor bill in toto is hard to compute. I shall therefore give my vote and support to this measure. If, then, the bill is to pass; if it is to pass substantially without amendment, as we see it must; then, under the privilege granted to print objections and proposed amendments and remarks in the RECORD, and thereby emphasize and characterize its defects, I submit to gentlemen if that is not all-sufficient, and if we should not go on with the reading of this bill and pass it to-night? [Cries of "Good!" and applause.]

I was glad to hear the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SINGLETON,] something like an hour ago, appeal to what I thought was the common sense of the House. The session is waning and accumulated legislation is pressing for attention. An extra session already begins to threaten with all its expenditures and uncertainties. I say again, appealing to gentlemen with all respect and with no desire to dictate to or lecture the House, as it is only a question of time in passing this bill, should we not desist from these amendments and remarks, read the bill, and pass it to-night? [Cries of "Good!" and applause.]

The amendment of Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa, was rejected.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. I have not got through with that section yet. I move the following amendment:

Provided, That $5,000 of this amount shall be expended in the completion of the work of dredging the channel opposite Guttenberg Island.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Mississippi River at Quincy, Illinois, $10,000.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I desire to make a verbal amendment to which the chairman will consent. It is to strike out "Mississippi River" and insert "Quincy Bay," "Mississippi River" having been inserted by mistake.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Des Moines Rapids, Iowa and Illinois, $25,000.

Mr. McCOID. I move to strike out "$25,000" and insert "$96,580."

Mr. Chairman, the Des Moines Rapids, at Keokuk—the canal there, in its successful operation, is necessary for the commerce of the river above that point. The work is not completed. The engineer in charge, Captain Stickney, says that $96,000, the amount which I have placed in that amendment, will complete the project. This is a very small addition to the total amount of this bill. The work should be completed. The committee have adopted that practice in other cases where small amounts were necessary to complete the work and included the whole amount in the bill. There are instances in the bill where the whole amount is given to complete any work. This small amount will complete this important work. If you do not do that, the amount appropriated is really money lost, for the reason that if the work is not completed the damage resulting in its present state consumes the amount of the annual appropriations. That has been the case in the past and is likely to continue until the work is finished. Now, the Committee on Commerce propose to give $25,000. This will simply tide over the year, the work not being completed, and will be practically lost money. There is no economy in that. The engineer in charge of the work is a careful man and has not overestimated the amount. I wish to print in this connection some letters which will make it clear, as well as his report in reference to this matter. These are as follows:

KEOKUK, IOWA, January 20, 1881.

DEAR SIR: I wish to call your attention to the importance of securing the appropriation to complete the Des Moines Rapids Canal. As the work now is, in its unfinished state, it is liable to be injured by floods, and suspend the operation of the canal to the great injury of commerce.

It should be completed and placed beyond the danger of being damaged, necessitating expensive repairs, and obstructing the great traffic upon the river.

I hope this will receive your support and the favorable attention of Congress.

Very respectfully, yours,

WM. A. BROWNELL.

Hon. M. A. MCCOID, Washington, D. C.

IMPROVEMENT OF THE DES MOINES RAPIDS OF THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER, AND OPERATING THE CANAL.

Officer in charge, Captain Amos Stickney, Corps of Engineers.

The present project for this improvement was adopted July 19, 1867, the object being to secure a channel over the rapids, navigable at all times, with five feet depth at the extreme low-water stage of the river. This has been essentially secured by the construction of a canal along the west river bank from the city of Keokuk, Iowa, to the village of Nashville, Iowa, a distance of 7.6 miles, and open cuts through the chains and patches of rock from Nashville to Montrose, Iowa, a distance of about 3.5 miles. The canal is three hundred feet wide with the exception of a little less than two miles of its length, which is two hundred and fifty feet wide. The open cuts when finished are to be two hundred feet wide.

The natural channel over the rapids was extremely narrow, crooked, and difficult to navigate even at medium stages of water, and was utterly impassable at extreme low water for boats of ordinary size; and even lumber rafts were often broken up and a large part of them lost in making the passage. The amount expended to June 30, 1880, is $4,303,495.06 for construction of improvement, and $127,565 for operating and maintaining the canal since the opening, August 22, 1877, and has resulted in essentially completing the canal and making a fairly passable channel above the canal. The balance of the amount appropriated up to date, $67,439.94, and the amount asked for, $136,580, are to be applied to the completion of the improvement and to operating and maintaining canal to June 30, 1882.

NOTE.—The canal was closed eighty-nine days, from December 9 to March 8, on account of cessation of river navigation, and seven days, from June 24 to June 30, on account of extreme high water. The boats and barges at work in the canal are not included in this statement except in the number of lockages.

I hope, Mr. Chairman, that the committee will not reject this amendment. It will, as I have stated, increase the amount of the bill but very little, the difference between $25,000 and $96,000 being all that is asked; and it will be remembered that this is asked simply to complete work now in progress and required as a matter of economy. The walls of that canal are subject to be damaged to such an extent that it may take the entire amount you now appropriate to repair it, besides immense damage to commerce. That has been to some extent the case in the past and will be again. In this report instances are given where heavy damage has occurred. Again, the walls in the locks are not high enough, and the careening of vessels causes damage, making an expenditure of money for their repairs, which should not be. I have personally visited and examined the work and know of the necessity of this appropriation. I appeal to the Committee on Commerce to accept the amendment, and the friends of the bill to adopt it. I am myself in favor of the bill and expect to vote for it for the reason that I believe in the principle; I believe that the total amount of the bill is not too much for this great work of improving our rivers and harbors. I believe that every dollar that we invest in different portions of the country in this kind of necessary work tends to bind it together as with hoops of steel. I wish we could build the necessary canals and solve the question of transportation in this way.

If our rivers are made inviting and sufficient for the transit of commerce to the sea, and the necessary canals were constructed, the Illinois and Fox River Canal, a canal from the mouth of the Mississippi to the Saint John's River, in Florida, and others, very much would be done toward the solution of the great question of interstate commerce. Accompany it then with a just regulation of railways and we will have met the demand for practical statesmanship which is felt in the country.

There are many subjects of just criticism in the bill, but take the great bulk of it and it is as nearly right as can be expected. Every other appropriation bill which passes might prove as vulnerable. Be guided by these criticisms and you will make no progress. For the evils in it the majority which have placed them there are responsible.

The necessity for the passage of some bill is justification for those who accept it as the best they can get. The adoption of this just amendment will in no way prejudice the measure but will win it friends. I hope it may be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Iowa.

The committee divided; and there were ayes 37, noes not counted.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Operating canal at Des Moines Rapids, Iowa and Illinois: Continued operation of the canal, $40,000.

Mr. CONGER. I desire, Mr. Chairman, to move to strike out that paragraph and when we reach them to strike out and modify two other paragraphs referred to in the amendment which I propose here, so that we may adopt a substitute for that and the others in this one's place, and I send to the desk the amendment to be read for the information of the committee, then I shall ask leave to submit a few remarks in connection with it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out lines 625, 626, and 627, and insert "that a sufficient amount of money is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the operating and repairs of the Des Moines Rapids Canal, and Saint Mary's Falls Canal, and the Louisville and Portland Canal; and the Secretary of War is hereby authorized from time to time to draw his warrant upon the Treasury for such amounts as are necessary for the operation and repairs of said canals.

Mr. CONGER. In this bill there are appropriations in the places to which I have referred, pages 27, 29, and 34, in all appropriations for the repairs and operation of the three great Government canals, the Des Moines Rapids Canal, the Portland and Louisville Canal, and the Sault Ste. Mary's Canal. Congress heretofore made a general appropriation, or intended to, for the Portland and Louisville Canal, which, when presented to the Comptroller for the payment of the operating expenses this year, was found not to have in it the words "out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated;" so that the appropriation was not defined and the money could not be paid for that and the other canal.

Now, shipping men on the lake, on the Ohio and on the Mississippi Rivers, apprehend this difficulty under the annual appropriation, that if for any cause the river and harbor bill should fail to become a law there would be no money to operate or repair these canals, and no officer of the Government would have any right to use any money for the purpose of such operation or repairs upon the canals unless such appropriation had been theretofore made by law.

And the whole commerce of those rivers and lakes might be stopped by an accident requiring repairs or by the lack of a force to operate the canal.

After consultation with several gentlemen interested in these canals and with some members of the Committee on Commerce, I find that this is the usual form of appropriation for that class of works, and is the proper one to secure a sufficient sum for operating the canals and for their repairs; and that it will not depend upon the chance of the passage or the lack of passage of a river and harbor bill, if such a misfortune should occur as did occur once before.

One word more. We cannot tell at what time, for some cause, a river and harbor bill may fail to pass, and every gentleman can realize how great a misfortune to the commerce of these great highways of the country it would be if by any chance there was no money appropriated and the law made it a penal offense for any officer of the Government to use any money to open and operate and repair these canals.

Mr. WILLIS. I only desire to occupy a moment, to say that the law on the statute-book, so far as the Louisville and Portland Canal is concerned, covers the amendment which the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] has offered. The difficulty in that case is that the First Comptroller of the Treasury, against the opinion of every lawyer who has examined the matter, has rendered a decision which nullifies this law passed by Congress last May. Under the peculiar organization of our Government the First Comptroller is higher than the President of the United States. By a two-thirds vote of this House we can override a veto of the President. But there is no appeal from the First Comptroller's decision. It becomes necessary, therefore, in order to meet his views, that an amendment of the character suggested by the gentleman from Michigan shall be passed.

I have already called the attention of over one hundred and six members of the House to this matter, and have obtained from them a written request to the Committee on Commerce asking the passage of this very amendment; and as the matter is thoroughly understood by the House, it is not necessary to occupy their time further.

The necessity for this amendment will clearly appear from a quotation from a letter recently addressed to the Cincinnati Board of Trade by General Godfrey Weitzel, who is the engineer in charge of the Louisville and Portland Canal. I will ask the Clerk to read the extract I have marked.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to say to the House that this amendment was drawn up and submitted to the First Comptroller of the Treasury and by him was supposed to cover entirely the case.

The Clerk read as follows:

If Congress will amend the statute so as to provide, without any question or doubt, for a continuing appropriation to operate and keep the canal in repair, it will be preferable to the re-establishment of tolls, because it will save commerce the amount of the toll and the Government the salary of a toll collector. If any break or accident should then occur in the canal there would be nothing in a statute properly worded to prevent the Secretary of War from drawing his warrant on the Secretary of the Treasury for the amount necessary to repair said break or accident.

Mr. WILLIS. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan meets that difficulty; and I do not think it will be objected to by any member of the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HUBBELL. Mr. Chairman, only one word. I desire to say, on behalf of the Saint Mary's Canal, that Congress at its last session on the river and harbor bill accepted this canal and made it free; but for lack of the phraseology in the act making the warrants payable out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the ruling of the First Comptroller in the Portland Canal case is applicable in the case of this canal. It was the intention of Congress in that act to make this canal free; and I send to the Clerk's desk the provision of the last river and harbor bill upon that subject that it may be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving and operating Saint Mary's River and Saint Mary's Falls Canal, $250,000. And the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to accept on behalf of the United States from the State of Michigan the Saint Mary's Canal and the public works thereon: Provided, Such transfer shall be so made as to leave the United States free from any and all debts, claims, or liability of any character whatsoever, and said canal after such transfer shall be free for public use: And provided further, That after such transfer the Secretary of War be, and hereby is, authorized to draw from time to time his warrant on the Secretary of the Treasury to pay the actual expenses of operating and keeping said canal in repair.

The question being taken on Mr. CONGER's amendment, it was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

Improving Missouri River at Saint Charles, Missouri, $15,000.

Mr. FROST. I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 654 strike out "$15,000" and insert "$55,000;" so that it will read: "Improving Missouri River at Saint Charles, Missouri, $55,000."

Mr. FROST. I do not desire to occupy the time of the committee, but I want to make one remark with respect to this improvement. It is of a most important character. It is of a national character, and not local in any sense. The object of this improvement is to obviate the obstructions offered to the river by construction of the bridge of what was a few months ago the Kansas City and Northern Railway. That bridge has occupied such a position across the Missouri River as to have deflected the current; and if prompt measures be not taken within the next few months the result may be the closing of the Missouri River. The city of Saint Charles is situated about fifteen miles above the junction of the Missouri River with the Mississippi; and it becomes a question as to whether or not the entire navigation of the Missouri River shall or shall not be suspended.

With these remarks I leave the question to the committee. The appropriation proposed to be made in the bill, as I have been informed by the engineer in charge, will not be sufficient. The estimate in the report of the engineer requires for this fiscal year $55,000, and but $15,000 has been accorded by the committee. I am willing to predict that unless the appropriation be increased the entire navigation of the Missouri River will be closed within the next six months.

I hope the committee will adopt the amendment which I have offered.

The question being taken on Mr. FROST's amendment, it was not agreed to.

The Clerk read the following:

Survey of Missouri River from its mouth to Fort Benton, Montana: Continuing survey above Sioux City, $30,000.

Mr. SAPP. I move to insert after the paragraph just read that which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For improving main channel of the Missouri River from its mouth to Sioux City, through and along the States of Missouri, Kansas, Nebraska, and Iowa, $100,000; which sum shall be used in removing the worst bars and obstructions as shown by the surveys heretofore made.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. SAPP. I now move to amend the paragraph by striking out "$30,000" and inserting "$50,000" for the survey above Sioux City.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read the following:

Improving Saint Mary's River and Saint Mary's Falls Canal, Michigan: Completing improvement, $150,000; and for operating and repairs of said canal from the time the same shall be turned over to the United States by the State of Michigan, $50,000.

Mr. CONGER. I move to amend the paragraph just read by striking out the latter portion of it, relating to operating and repairs of the canal, it having already been provided for.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following:

Improving Yellowstone River, Montana and Dakota, $20,000.

Mr. WHITEAKER. I move to insert after the paragraph last read the following:

For protecting the beach at Point Adams, Oregon, $20,500.

I have but a word or two to say in support of that amendment. It is recommended by the engineer in charge of this district. The beach at this point is being worn away very rapidly, and the channel at the entrance of the river, which is always a difficult one, is being injured. The engineer says that in a very short time the reservation at this point will be interfered with by the washing away of this beach. This amendment has the indorsement of the board of engineers and has been submitted to the action of the House by the Secretary of War. I think it would be wisdom and economy to make this appropriation. It is necessary to protect the entrance of this great river.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. ROBESON. I ask unanimous consent, as we have ten pages more of this bill to read, that the Clerk be authorized to merely mention the name of the river or harbor for which an appropriation is proposed, and as he passes along any member who wishes to move an amendment may call attention to the clause and offer his amendment.

The CHAIRMAN, [Mr. SPRINGER.] If there be no objection the Clerk will so read.

Mr. SPARKS. There is objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will proceed with the reading.

The Clerk read the following:

Improving Sacramento River, California, $30,000.

Mr. BERRY. I move to insert after the paragraph just read that which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

For protecting the navigation of the Feather and Sacramento Rivers, California, from injury by the débris washed into those streams and their tributaries by mining operations, $150,000.

Mr. BERRY. I do not propose to weary the attention of this committee. I only regret that I have not had an opportunity to bring this subject before the House at a time when members were disposed to listen to the discussion of a question which is growing in importance in our State, and which must be adjusted by the Congress of the United States.

It is a fact that by reason of mining operations in progress in the State of California during the last twenty-five years the navigation of the Sacramento River has been destroyed. Furthermore, the most competent engineers in the United States—Captain Eads, as well as Government engineers, and the best engineering talent that could be procured by the State of California—have expressed the opinion that not only will the navigation of that river be destroyed, but the Bay of San Francisco itself will be permanently destroyed. It has been ascertained by the engineers that within the last five years twenty-five billion cubic yards of the wash of these mines have gone into that bay.

Captain Eads, when he was employed by the governor of California as consulting engineer, said in his report that it was only a question of time when the navigation of Sacramento River as well as the bay of San Francisco would be destroyed.

And permit me to say here that the State of California, for the sake of protecting property adjacent to these streams which is in danger of being destroyed, within the last year has levied a tax of half a million of dollars, and is now expending it in an endeavor to impound this mining débris in the mountains and prevent it reaching the navigable waters of this State.

During the last session of this Congress there was incorporated in the river and harbor appropriation bill an amendment directing an examination of this question to be made. In obedience to that law a report has been made by the Engineer, and he recommends an appropriation of $150,000 to be expended upon the tributaries of these rivers for the purpose of preventing this débris from flowing into them. It is now calculated that one hundred and sixty-three miles of the beds of these streams have been raised upon an average about nine feet.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BELFORD. I want to say a word or two in reference to this amendment.

Mr. BERRY. Will the gentleman yield me a little more time?

Mr. BELFORD. I will in a moment. This subject, as I understand, was before the Committee on Mines and Mining of this House during the last session of Congress, and was very favorably considered by the members of that committee.

I think this appropriation is one that ought to be made, and I hope sincerely that this House will agree to the amendment offered by the gentleman from California, [Mr. BERRY.] I now yield the remainder of my time to that gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has no right to yield. If he had taken the floor to oppose the amendment, he would have been entitled to five minutes; but having favored the amendment, he is not entitled to further time.

Mr. CONVERSE. I move to strike out the last word, and I yield my five minutes to my friend from California, [Mr. BERRY.]

Mr. BERRY. Now, Mr. Chairman, if this were any other question with which the Congress of the United States had to deal, I would not presume at this stage of our proceedings to inflict any remarks upon the House. But to-day by reason of these streams having been filled up by débris, their carrying capacity is virtually destroyed, and millions and millions of property in the Sacramento Valley are to-day rendered valueless. The Legislature of California has chartered two steamboats, one being sent up the valley and the other down, for the purpose of taking the people from the house-tops and out of barn-lofts. In many instances the rivers have deserted their beds. The State of California is endeavoring to deal with this subject, and the Engineer Department of the United States has recommended that the Government make an appropriation to aid in the construction of the work now in progress. The State of California has constructed two dams more than two miles long to impound the débris and prevent it from reaching the lower drainage-way, hoping thus that the river will be able to carry off the débris and the channels permitted to reconstruct themselves.

In view of the fact that not only the rivers but the bays are being utterly destroyed, the Congress of the United States should do something to meet this question. There is now pending in the courts an effort to stop the process of hydraulic mining. Unless something is done, the whole Sacramento Valley must be inundated annually. To meet the exigency of the case some remedial measure must be adopted by Congress at once.

Mr. CULBERSON obtained the floor, and yielded to Mr. CONVERSE.

Mr. CONVERSE. I wish to occupy but a minute in behalf of the amendment of my friend from California, [Mr. BERRY.] The Government of the United States, by the use of its mining lands, is creating this silt and filling up the river. In view of this, it is the duty of the Government to keep the river clear. In my judgment an appropriation ought to be made for this river. A few thousand dollars expended now will save an expenditure of many millions a few years hence. I hope the appropriation will be made. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The question then recurred on the amendment of Mr. BERRY.

Mr. REAGAN. I want to call attention to the position of this matter, because I think we had better not make a mistake. The evils referred to by the gentleman from California are well and strongly stated. There has been a report of engineers which we have never had an opportunity to examine. My understanding is that this work, when inaugurated, will cost many millions of dollars. I do not think it ought to be inaugurated without an understanding of the effect, extent, and character of the work to be engaged in. Important as the question is to California, I think it would be a great mistake to move in the matter before we can do so advisedly.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. BERRY, it was not agreed to.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the paragraph by striking out "$30,000" and inserting "$60,000," which is the amount mated for by the board of engineers. While I sympathize with the effort of my colleague [Mr. BERRY] to secure an appropriation to prevent débris from floating down into the Sacramento River from mining districts in the mountains, I am also in favor of appropriating now a sufficient amount of money, upon the recommendation of the board of engineers, to improve the navigation of that river as it now stands.

The Sacramento River is navigable for two hundred and ten miles, and by a very little expenditure of money could be made navigable for two hundred and fifty miles. This river for fifteen years—from 1849 to 1864—was the only means by which the commerce of the middle and northern portion of the State of California was carried to the bay of San Francisco. Since that time there have been some railroads built; but they are nearly all owned and operated by one company; and this river, if kept open, is the only transportation line that can compete with the railroads.

I am not here to ask for anything that has not been recommended by a competent board of engineers. I find that the engineers have made a very lengthy report on this subject. They say that the improvement of the river is the only means by which any competition in freight can be maintained:

There is a railroad on each side of the river, a few miles distant, both of which are owned by the same company. These roads adjust their freights in some degree in reference to river competition.

A vast amount of commerce coming from the middle and northern part of our State is carried over this river, and I say that it is unjust to propose so small an appropriation, $30,000, for this great river, which bears upon its bosom the commerce of an empire. Because no more than $60,000 was asked for by the engineers, the committee struck a dividing line and said they would give one-half. If there is any river in the United States appropriated for by this bill which is located within the boundaries of any State and carries so large an amount of the products of a single State as this river does, I would like to know it. While large appropriations are made ni this bill for "Duck creeks" and "Goose creeks" and "Little Kanawhas," the appropriation for the Sacramento River, carrying, as I said before, the commerce of an empire, is reduced to the pitiful sum of $30,000.

Mr. PAGE's amendment was disagreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving San Joaquin River, California, $30,000.

Mr. PAGE. This, perhaps, is the last time I shall trouble the House on this bill, and perhaps I ought to apologize for attempting to do what is impossible. When I look around and see the sleek and rotund forms of my friend from Texas and my other friend here from Maine, [Mr. REED,] and see with what glee they rub their fat sides and chuckle over the fact that Maine and Texas are well povided for, I have no doubt they wonder why we should have the temerity to move to increase the appropriation for this river in this river and harbor bill. I have no doubt of it. They are gorged with the pork of this river and harbor bill. [Laughter.] I will endeavor to make an amendment that will give us something like the amount we are entitled to for the improvement of this river.

The CHAIRMAN. Nothing is before the committee.

Mr. PAGE. I move to strike out "twenty" and insert "fifty," which is the amount of the estimate. I hold in my hand a petition sent here by many thousand residents of the San Joaquin Valley, and I desire to print the preamble:

We, your petitioners, respectfully represent that the San Joaquin River is the natural outlet to the counties of San Joaquin, Stanislaus, Merced, Tuolumne, Mariposa, Calaveras, and Fresno, embracing an area of 9,360,000 acres, more than half of which is arable land, now containing a population of about ninety thousand, shipping annually about five hundred thousand tons of grain, and receiving all that is necessary to supply a thriving agricultural and manufacturing community, including large importations of lumber. In consequence of natural and artificial obstructions the navigation of the San Joaquin River is both difficult and dangerous. We therefore petition your honorable body to make an appropriation of not less than $200,000 for the purpose of removing said obstructions.

This is no Kanawha or Duck Creek. This is a valley of 90,000 population, having an area of over 9,360,000 acres, which is annually producing 500,000 tons of grain. Over the San Joaquin River alone annually pass over 210,000 bushels of grain raised in this valley. I have here a map of the San Joaquin River, and it is shown this river is gradually shoaling, so much so it is dangerous to navigation. They ask for a reasonable sum for the improvement of this river.

Mr. Chairman, I am not here, nor are my constituents, to "crook the pregnant hinges of the knee where thrift may follow fawning." I am not here to obey the behests of the Committee on Commerce. I am here to represent what I believe to be in the judgment of my constituents and in the judgment of the honest thinking men of this House a meritorious proposition. I have asked to increase it by the votes of this committee, but I know it is useless. The edict has gone forth that no more money is to be appropriated; a portion of the members have got their amount of pork and nobody else is to have any; but I predict there is a time coming when these men who are now gorged with pork will perhaps themselves, in another Congress, be compelled to occupy the position we now occupy, and then, perhaps, they will not be so unanimous in favor of this bill as they are now. [Laughter and applause.] I ask to have printed a letter with my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. PAGE. The letter is as follows:

STOCKTON, January 27, 1881.

DEAR SIR: We, the undersigned, desire to call your attention to the urgent necessity that exists of asking for Government aid in order to save Mormon Slough, in the city of Stockton, from being filled up and destroyed for commercial purposes. We submit the following statement of facts and reasons in relation thereto:

First. The city of Stockton has 15,000 inhabitants. It is at the head of tide-water, and is the natural outlet for the large portion of the State known as the San Joaquin Valley, a valley two hundred and forty miles in length and from thirty to fifty miles in width. The water-front of Stockton consists of two sloughs, "Stockton" and "Mormon" Sloughs, of about equal length. These come together a short distance below the city and form a single slough thence to the San Joaquin River.

Second. Mormon Slough formerly had a channel of one hundred feet in width, with average depth of fifteen feet. To-day, owing to changes in the channel of the Calaveras River, by which a portion of its water at flood runs into Mormon Slough, the latter has become so filled up that it is scarcely four feet deep at low tide.

Third. On Mormon Slough are situated two brick warehouses, which contain at this time on storage 1,200,000 bushels of wheat, and which are most of the year receiving and shipping wheat.

Fourth. Unless this important channel is thoroughly dredged out it will have to be abandoned by these different enterprises and establishments. When, however, it is dredged out and made fit for the uses of commerce, its entire water-front (say nine thousand feet) will be used by other enterprises similar in character to those already established.

Colonel Mendell, chief of the Government Corps of Engineers on this coast, has made an accurate survey of Mormon Slough, and has asked of the General Government an appropriation of $50,000 to assist, first, in clearing away obstacles to the navigation of the San Joaquin River, and second, to dredge out Mormon and Stockton Sloughs.

In making the general appropriations by Congress for the present year this amount will or ought to form part of same.

Now, when this matter comes up, we desire you to use your influence that the amount asked for by Colonel Mendell be made part of the appropriations, and that it be not cut down. His intention, as he informs us, is to use a large part of the $50,000 to remove obstructions to navigation in the Upper San Joaquin River at points above where the slough from Stockton joins that river. In case the appropriation is cut down, there will not remain anything for the improvements at Stockton itself, and in such case, in another year this channel will be so shallow as to seriously interfere with navigation of vessels drawing even the lightest draught.

In this matter are most deeply concerned the inhabitants of the city of Stockton, and indeed of the whole San Joaquin Valley, and we do not doubt but that you will give the matter all the assistance you can in Congress.

Mr. REED. I am sorry my friend from California has made his allusion to the figures of the gentleman from Texas and myself.

Mr. PAGE. You are not ashamed of them?

Mr. REED. By no manner of means. I sincerely believe that gentleman would make an acceptable addition to the couple and make a good trio with us.

I wish to say a word in seriousness about this matter. The gentleman from California has charged that certain other gentlemen have their proportion, and are therefore satisfied. Now, I wish to say to him and to other gentlemen here, had they been as reasonable as some other gentlemen on the floor it might have turned out that they would have been satisfied also.

The appropriation which is contained in this bill for Portland Harbor is only 33 per cent. of the amount which the engineer says can be made available this year. Certainly it is not unreasonable for me to wish to obtain that. If I had come here and proposed to obtain every dollar which the engineer recommended, I should expect this committee might treat me as it has treated other gentlemen, and for a plain reason. We have to do practical business in this House. Statesmanship does not consist in doing the best thing, but in doing the best possible thing. Now, the possible thing in regard to the river and harbor bill is just this: You cannot afford to make the bill too large; for if you do you cannot pass it. We have got a bill larger than has been the custom for a great many years; a bill appropriating more than $10,000,000, in which every improvement has been provided for as well as the judgment of the Committee on Commerce could suggest. And I submit the total result of this debate shows that the division among the different improvements of this country has been on the whole fairly made.

I freely admit that the gentleman from California has important enterprises which he represents, that he has an empire State and that he is entitled to a large amount, and in due time he will receive a large amount. For we are but at the beginning of the great work which is upon us, a work for the improvement of the rivers and harbors of this country, a gigantic work, a work which is going on year after year, and I believe is going to go on for ages. But we cannot do everything at once. We have to do what the resources of the country and, above all, what the sentiment of the country will support and sustain. I believe the time is coming when the public sentiment in this country is going to support a larger bill, and the gentleman from California will be completely satisfied. He made a struggle which was creditable to himself, and we have favored a bill which I believe is creditable to the committee.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Examinations and surveys at South Pass of Mississippi River: To ascertain the depth of water and width of channel secured and maintained from time to time, by James B. Eads, at South Pass of the Mississippi River, and to enable the Secretary of War to report during the maintenance of the work, $10,000.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

And also to ascertain by soundings whether and to what extent, within a distance of five miles from the present mouth of the river at the South Pass, the Gulf has filled up by deposits from the river since the construction of the Eads jetties.

Mr. WARNER. I hope the committee will accept that amendment. When the work of constructing these jetties was begun engineers eminent in their profession predicted that new bars would be formed in front of those jetties in the Gulf. Others as eminent in their profession claimed that the littoral currents of the Gulf would carry the débris away and leave the Gulf clear at that point. It is now reported that the Gulf, from one to five miles out from the mouth of the South Pass, is filling up. This claim on the other hand is denied; and I merely ask for the adoption of this amendment in order that the information which this committee ought to have before it now may be obtained.

Mr. ACKLEN. I see no objection to the adoption of that amendment.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 53, noes 29.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WARNER. I ask consent to print some figures in connection with this matter at this place.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. WARNER. The figures to which I refer are as follows. I am informed that by surveys made in 1874 and 1879, by Major C. W. Howell and Captain M. R. Brown, it was ascertained that the fill in front of the jetties out the following distances from shore was—

| | Feet. |
| 820 feet out | 7½ |
| 2,000 feet out | 9 |
| 3,000 feet out | 9 |
| 4,000 feet out | 12 |
| 5,000 feet out | 9 |
| 6,000 feet out | 10 |
| 7,000 feet out | 8 |
| 8,000 feet out | 5 |
| 9,000 feet out | 5 |
| 11,000 feet or 2 miles out, (Gulf 132 feet deep) | 50 |
| 12,000 feet or 2 miles out | 55 |
| 14,000 feet or 2 miles out, (Gulf 173 feet deep) | 28 |
| 15,000 feet or 2 miles out | 46 |
| 18,000 feet or 2 miles out, (Gulf 205 feet deep) | 46½ |
| 19,000 feet or 2 miles out | 42 |
| 20,000 feet or 2 miles out, (Gulf 217 feet deep) | 40 |
| 21,000 feet or 2 miles out | 40 |
| 22,000 feet or 2 miles out, (Gulf 230 feet deep) | 52 |
| 24,000 feet or 2 miles out | 39 |
| 27,000 feet or 5 miles out | 60 |

At this point the Gulf is 240 feet deep, and at the same rate bottom will come to surface in eighteen or nineteen years.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Altamaha River, South Carolina, $5,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee propose to strike out, in line 725, "South Carolina" and insert "Georgia."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Bayou Bartholomew, Louisiana, $8,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee propose to insert, after the word "Louisiana," the words "and Arkansas," in line 731.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Rancocas River, Delaware, $10,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee propose, in line 739, after the word "Delaware," to insert "and New Jersey."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Pasquotank River, Virginia and South Carolina, $5,000.

Mr. YEATES. I move to strike out in this paragraph the word "Virginia," as that Pasquotank River is not in Virginia. It is not in that State.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Wateree River, South Carolina, $8,000.
Improving Santee River, South Carolina, $22,000.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 786, after the word "Carolina," add the words "by deepening and straightening its outlet to Winyah Bay through Mosquito Creek."

Mr. KENNA. That carries out the purpose of the committee in making this appropriation, and there will be I imagine no objection to it.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving harbor at Brazos, San Diego, Texas, $75,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee propose to amend by inserting before the word "harbor" the words "bar and;" and also by striking out the words "San Diego" and inserting "Santiago."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the expenses of operating and maintaining the Louisville and Portland Canal for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1881, $42,000, which sum shall be immediately available; and for the same purpose for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, $40,500.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Since the adoption of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Michigan I presume that can all be stricken out.

Mr. CONGER. Not all of it. I move to strike out the last clause, beginning at line 806, with the word "and." It is provided in the amendment heretofore adopted by the committee for and after this fiscal year.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving entrance to Yaquina Bay, Oregon, $10,000.

The CHAIRMAN. There is a typographical error in this paragraph which the committee propose to correct. "Yaguina" should be "Yaquina."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WHITEAKER. I offer the following amendment to come in after line 809:

For improving the entrance to Coquille River, Oregon, $10,000.

That amendment is justified by the report of the engineers, and is the exact amount of the estimates. I hope it will be agreed to.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read the following:

Improving Richmond Harbor, Kennebec River, Maine, $10,000; of which sum $6,000 shall be expended for wing-dams and dredging at the head of Swan's Island and at Hatch's Rock, and $4,000 in dredging and deepening the channel at the foot of Swan's Island according to the plan recommended by Lieutenant Russell.

Mr. BRAGG. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting after line 824 as follows:

"To enable the Secretary of War to pay the damages already ascertained by reason of the flowage and damage done private property by the construction of the improvements of the Fox and Wisconsin Rivers in the State of Wisconsin, $500,000. And the said Secretary is hereby authorized and required to apply the sum hereby appropriated, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to the payment of the damages so ascertained according to law."

Mr. BRAGG. I do not rise for the purpose of pleasing myself by the sound of my voice, neither do I rise with any great hopes of securing the passage of that amendment.

Mr. REAGAN. I reserve the point of order.

Mr. BRAGG. But I offer that amendment because I have heard very much said in this Hall about the necessity and the propriety of preserving the honor and the faith of the Government, and also to open the eyes of some of the members of this committee to what some of the legislation upon this class of bills leads to. I allude principally to a clause in the paragraph next following the one to which I make this amendment.

In 1874, when the Fox and the Wisconsin Rivers Improvement Company turned over their work to the Government there was a provision in the law then passed by this Congress providing that damages done to private property by flowage, &c., resulting from the construction of that improvement should be assessed and ascertained according to the laws of the State. Under that clause the assessments have been made. The United States has appeared before the commissioners by attorney. They have attended with their witnesses, and there have already been piled up awards against the Government somewhere from one to five hundred thousand dollars. The property of the individual has been taken for the use of the Government, and not one dollar has yet been paid. But the answer to every claim for payment is, no money has been appropriated. The Government has taken the property. The damages have been ascertained by the means pointed out by the act, and yet the Government has not paid a cent, and there is no prospect of their ever paying a cent, for the reason that that little clause in the bill authorizing the improvement and the assessment of damages which seemed to be so small a thing to the committee has grown to be of such magnitude that no committee dare face their offspring. I withdraw the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For reservoirs upon the headwaters of the Mississippi River and its tributaries, $150,000; and this sum, together with the sum of $75,000 heretofore appropriated for the construction of a dam at Lake Winnibigoshish, shall be expended at such places on said headwaters of the Mississippi River and its tributaries as the Secretary of War shall determine: And it is provided, That compensation for any private property taken or appropriated for any of said improvements, and all damages to private property caused by the construction of any of said dams, by flowage or otherwise, shall be ascertained and determined under and in accordance with the laws of the State in which such private property is situated. And the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to ascertain what, if any, injury is occasioned to the rights of any friendly Indians, occupying any Indian reservation, by the construction of any of said dams, or the cutting or the removing of trees or other materials from any such reservation for the construction or erection of any of said dams, and to determine the amount of damages payable to such Indians therefor; and all such damages to private property and to friendly Indians, when ascertained and determined in the manner herein directed and provided, shall be paid by the United States: Provided, however, That such damages shall not exceed 10 per cent. of the sums hereby and heretofore appropriated for the construction of said reservoirs.

Mr. McMILLIN. I should like to get some information as to this from the chairman of the Committee on Commerce. Not having the estimates and reports before me, I desire to know if the chairman or some member of the committee can inform me what that improvement will ultimately cost.

Mr. REAGAN. I am not able to give the aggregate. This is for making reservoirs at a number of points on the headwaters of the Mississippi River and its tributaries. There is a detailed report giving the cost for each one of the reservoirs which are being constructed on some general plan. I believe there are nine of them altogether; but the amount in this bill is intended to enable the construction of one reservoir for the purpose of testing the efficiency of the project.

Mr. SPARKS. Will the chairman of the Committee on Commerce state his judgment as to the practicability of this thing?

Mr. REAGAN. I cannot enter into a discussion of that now.

Mr. SPARKS. Do you not think it is impracticable?

Mr. REAGAN. The engineers do not think it is.

Mr. SPARKS. What do you think?

Mr. REAGAN. I cannot give the gentleman my opinion at present.

Mr. McMILLIN. I desire to state what I think. The subsequent history of this operation will prove that it is wholly impracticable. By any remarks I may make on the subject I do not wish to reflect on the thought or the earnestness bestowed by the committee upon this matter, for I have learned that the engineers have held that it is practicable. But from the very nature of the case, for a river rising in the northern latitudes and flowing through a sunny, hot region for two or three or four thousand miles to be supplied by reservoirs, and its tide kept up in that way, is as utterly impracticable as it would be to start persons with pans of water and pour it out when the season seemed to require it.

Mr. REAGAN. This is not intended to affect seriously the great body of the Mississippi River. It is intended to apply to rivers forming the headwaters of the Mississippi.

Mr. McMILLIN. Then it is not for the benefit of the lower streams?

Mr. REAGAN. It is not anticipated it can have any serious effect on the lower streams.

Mr. McMILLIN. I have been informed—how true it is I do not know—that a tide of thirteen feet as high up as Cairo does not give more than thirteen inches of flood at Vicksburgh. I have been told that by a gentleman from Mississippi, who lives on the river, and it seems to me we ought to go slow in a matter of this kind.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Have we not gone slow enough upon this bill?

Mr. McMILLIN. You cannot go too slow in this matter till you know more about it.

Mr. POUND. I am not surprised that some gentlemen upon this floor may not be informed fully upon the subject involved in this paragraph.

Mr. WARNER. That is exactly the situation of several of us; it is of myself, at any rate.

Mr. POUND. There is in this bill really no more valuable or important provision than the one now under consideration. There is no system of improvement of any stream which has been subjected to a more thorough examination and exhaustive inquiry than the one under consideration. It is impossible at this late hour, and in the limited time allowed for discussion, to even outline the arguments in favor of this proposition. Here are three very voluminous reports of the Engineer Department, which have been before this House and before Congress——

Mr. CLYMER. The gentleman will not say that, I am sure. I have besought him for three mortal days to get me a copy of one of these reports, and he would not let me have it.

Mr. POUND. I desire to say in reply to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLYMER] that he did make inquiry in reference to the annual report submitted by the Secretary of War, and I said to him that they might be had at the committee-room.

Mr. CLYMER. I went to the committee-room for them, and I have never been able to obtain one of them.

Mr. POUND. I desire to inform my friend that these are special reports.

Mr. CLYMER. Given to the members of the Committee on Commerce, I suppose.

Mr. POUND. No, but referring to this particular subject. There are great numbers of these reports now on file in the document-room which may be had by members.

I would be glad, if I had time, to outline some of the arguments and points involved in this question; but it is quite impossible to do so in the time allowed me, and I must therefore rest this case upon the favorable action of the Committee on Commerce, and indorsed by every member of Congress and every Senator from the portion of country to be affected by these works.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WARNER. I move to strike out the last word. We have had already presented here to-night a proposition to appropriate $500,000 to pay for damages similar to those provided for in this paragraph, and it was ruled out on a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is mistaken in regard to that; it was not ruled out on a point of order.

Mr. WARNER. On which a point of order was made. I am glad to make the correction. Now, how many hundred thousand dollars for damages this will involve I do not know.

Mr. WASHBURN. Only 10 per cent. of the amount.

Mr. WARNER. How much is this likely to involve? Another $500,000 or $1,000,000?

Mr. WASHBURN. Only 10 per cent. of the entire appropriation.

Mr. WARNER. Of this appropriation?

Mr. POUND. Will the gentleman permit me to say one word?

Mr. WARNER. Certainly.

Mr. POUND. I desire to state that the land affected by these works is worthless for any other purpose than this.

Mr. WARNER. How much will the Government have to pay for this worthless land in Wisconsin?

Mr. REAGAN. I will answer the gentleman's question. The damages under this act cannot exceed 10 per cent. on $225,000. This provision limits the damage to that amount.

Mr. WARNER. Ten per cent. upon the present appropriation?

Mr. POUND. That is all.

The motion to strike out the paragraph was not agreed to.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to move an amendment, to come in after the paragraph now pending. Owing to the fact that two reports in relation to two improvements of harbors did not reach the Committee on Commerce until after this bill was printed, the provisions I desire to have inserted by way of amendment were not incorporated in this bill.

I desire to move an amendment appropriating $7,000 for continuing the improvement of Clinton River, Michigan, and $7,000 for removing the sand-bar and improving the harbor of refuge from ice at the mouth of Belle River on Saint Clair Straits, Michigan. The amount estimated for one of these improvements is $17,500, and for the other $15,169.

I think the Committee on Commerce—at all events I have been told so by some of its members—would have put these amounts in this bill if the reports of the engineers upon these improvements had been before them at the time the bill was being prepared. Some members of the committee, having examined this matter, have so said to me.

I have waited until all the provisions in this bill for improvements have been considered. These two improvements which I desire to have inserted are the only appropriations for my district. One of them is an appropriation for continuing an improvement which is absolutely necessary to permit the passage of steamboats and vessels up the harbor to Mount Clemens in my district from Lake Saint Clair, and is necessary to complete the improvement so as to make the river navigable.

The other is for removing the sand-bar at the mouth of Belle River, which empties into the straits of Saint Clair, and which is the only place for twenty miles where vessels passing out of Saint Clair River into a side river can be protected from the flow of ice down that river. More than fifty thousand dollars' worth of vessel-property was destroyed last year because this and other bars prevented the entrance of vessels into this side-channel or harbor of refuge from ice.

The reports of the engineers are now before this committee, and if

I had time I should like to read them. I desire to say to the committee that in my judgment these amendments are essential and worthy to be presented here. Having been for six years a member of the Committee on Commerce and one of the sub-committee to prepare these bills during that time, I know this to be within the line of appropriations which that committee has invariably followed.

I have the assurance of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. TOWNSEND,] who has examined these reports, that if they had been brought before the committee before the bill was printed, these amounts, less than half the amounts reported by the engineers, would have been inserted in the bill. I ask the gentleman to corroborate my statement.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio. I wish to say in behalf of this amendment that these reports were issued last spring, but did not reach the committee-room at that time. The committee was waiting for them, but they were not received until after we had closed the bill. The evening the bill was finished the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] came into the room; but the reports could not be found, and he was very much disappointed. I am satisfied, from examination, that had these propositions been acted on by the committee, they would have been acted on as the gentleman from Michigan desired. I say this in justice to him and to the committee.

Mr. CONGER. This is my last request of the committee. I will take it as a peace offering. [Laughter.]

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. CONGER, there were—ayes 51, noes 45.

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. I make the point that no quorum has voted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state, in the interest of the transaction of business, that if this amendment be adopted in the Committee of the Whole, there will be a vote on it in the House.

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. I insist on the point. Meritorious amendments have been offered here and voted down time and again; and I am not willing that now an exception should be made.

Mr. YEATES. This objection stops the whole bill.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina, and Mr. CONGER were appointed.

Mr. PAGE. I hope the committee will not depart from their purpose by allowing any amendment to be made increasing the appropriations at this late hour. They have kept us here three days denying us the right to make any additions to the bill; and I hope that principle will not be deviated from now.

The CHAIRMAN. It is too late to discuss the amendment. The gentleman from North Carolina makes the point that no quorum has voted. The tellers will take their places.

The committee proceeded to divide; but before the count was concluded,

Mr. CONGER said: I withdraw my amendment. The brigadiers are against me in a solid body.

A MEMBER. The gentleman cannot withdraw his amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has the right to withdraw his amendment.

Mr. CONGER. There is a solid phalanx of brigadiers against my motion, as I believe, for some personal reason.

Mr. CULBERSON. I move to amend by inserting after line 851 the provision which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

It shall be the duty of the Secretary of War, whenever any work herein provided for shall be undertaken under contract, as herein permitted in certain cases to be done, to report to Congress within ten days after its next session the bids received for such work, and the names of the bidder or bidders, and the amount of each bid.

And whenever any work herein provided for shall be in whole or part executed by an officer of the Government acting under orders of the War Department, such officer shall make a report to the Secretary of War, containing a detailed statement of all moneys disbursed by him for such work, and the names of the laborers and contractors to whom paid, which report shall be transmitted to Congress.

Mr. TALBOTT. I do not propose to say how I would vote on this amendment, but I think the gentleman offering it intended to say "ten days after the commencement of the next regular session."

Mr. THOMAS TURNER. The language of the amendment now is, "ten days after its next session," which would be ten days after the adjournment.

The question being taken on agreeing to the amendment, there were—ayes 26, noes 47.

Mr. CONGER. I make the point that no quorum has voted. I think we may as well stop the bill right here.

The CHAIRMAN. No quorum having voted, the Chair appoints as tellers the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] and the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER.]

Mr. CULBERSON. I ask permission to say that this amendment simply requires that the officers executing the work under this bill shall make to the Secretary of War a statement how they performed that work. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The tellers will take their places.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported ayes 51, noes 61.

Mr. CONGER. No quorum.

Mr. CULBERSON. I withdraw my amendment. I do not want to obstruct the passage of the bill.

Mr. STEVENSON. I move that the committee rise. I understand that no quorum voted on the last question.

The CHAIRMAN. But the amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. STEVENSON. Then I withdraw the motion that the committee rise.

Mr. CONGER. But the vote has shown that there is no quorum here.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman from Michigan still insists that there is no quorum, the Chair must take notice of the fact, and no business can be transacted.

Mr. DE LA MATYR. I renew the motion that the committee rise.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. SIMONTON. I offer the amendment which has been sent to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 851 add the following:

"The engineers having in charge the improvements appropriated for in this bill shall report what effect the expenditures and improvements theretofore made have had upon the convenience, increase, or diminution of commerce, local and general, relating to said improvements, and the Secretary of War shall transmit the same to Congress with his annual estimates for the improvement of rivers and harbors."

Mr. SIMONTON. That amendment does not increase the appropriations in this bill. It provides for no new improvements. It provides for no new report, yet it proposes to furnish information which is very valuable to this House. Doubtless members feel a want of information. We make expenditures of large amounts of money upon the various streams of the country, and yet we have no way of ascertaining what effect these expenditures have had in the way of facilitating or increasing commerce. Now, in order to furnish that information I have offered this amendment.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to call the attention of the House and of the gentleman from Tennessee to a clause already in the bill reported, but not yet acted upon:

And in every case where examinations or surveys are made, the report thereon shall embrace such information concerning the commercial importance, present and prospective, of the improvement contemplated thereby, and such general commercial statistics as the Secretary of War may be able to procure.

This does not cover the whole of the information the gentleman asks for, but it covers all that is necessary to guide the House and its committee in determining the propriety of such appropriation. I suggest, therefore, the gentleman's amendment is not necessary.

Mr. SIMONTON. I suggest, Mr. Chairman, there is a greater difference than the gentleman from Texas seems to think. My amendment is intended to provide for works already begun and which have been in progress for years. It is to get information in regard to them after the work has been done or completed, if possible. This clause provides for getting such information before the work is commenced at all, when the survey is made preparatory to the work.

Mr. SIMONTON's amendment was rejected.

Mr. POEHLER. I move to amend by inserting after line 853 the following:

For the improvement of the Minnesota River, Minnesota, $60,000; to be expended according to the report of Colonel Farquhar, United States Engineers, of 1875.

Mr. Chairman, this is my last request, and it is also my first request. [Laughter.] I have not made any request of this House before. I do not make many, but I do request the committee to adopt this amendment.

I will make a statement of the importance of this improvement. The report upon it was very carefully made, and it was recommended as a work of great importance. I understand it was rejected in the committee because it had been made several years ago.

I do not know why we should make a new survey before we make any improvement. When we look over this bill and see the appropriations which have been made to places which do not have any portion of the commerce of the Minnesota River, I deem it my duty to claim for that river what the committee has refused to accord to it. I do not think injustice was done intentionally by the committee, but as I had only a short time to explain the matter to them, I do not believe they understood it.

The Minnesota River is navigable for nearly three hundred miles. It starts in Dakota and passes nearly through the whole State of Minnesota. There are not less than 10,000,000 of acres of the best agricultural land in the country washed by that stream. The Minnesota Valley lands are well known. It is the garden of Minnesota. It is inhabited, too, by nearly a quarter of a million of people. They raise not less than 20,000,000 bushels of wheat as well as other articles of great value. There are from fifteen to twenty villages and towns on that river with mills and factories of every description. I think it is entitled to some consideration. I did not ask an appropriation a year ago, as small appropriations do not do any good. I trust there will be no objection to this appropriation and that it will be adopted.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 31, noes 54.

Mr. POEHLER. No quorum has voted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will appoint Mr. POEHLER and Mr. KENNA as tellers.

Mr. POEHLER. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. CONGER. I move to amend by inserting as an amendment the following:

For continuing the improvement of Clinton River, Michigan, $6,500.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Michigan desire to address the committee?

Mr. CONGER. No, sir; I have made my remarks upon it. I have reduced the amount somewhat.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 21, noes 68.

Mr. CONGER. I make the point of order no quorum has voted.

The CHAIRMAN appointed Mr. WILSON and Mr. CONGER as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 28, noes 114.

Mr. CONGER. That is five short of a quorum.

Mr. TALBOTT. I move the committee rise for the purpose of having a call of the House.

Mr. REAGAN. No, let the roll be called under the rules.

Mr. BURROWS. I move the committee rise.

The motion was disagreed to.

Mr. REAGAN. If the tellers would only take their places, several members have come in and we might reach a quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. There are but a few votes lacking of a quorum, but every gentleman who desired to vote has had ample opportunity to do so. The Chair cannot compel members to vote.

Mr. WHITE. Let the tellers take their places again.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will cause the roll to be called under the rule.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll, after the completion of which the committee rose; and Mr. BLACKBURN having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. CARLISLE reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the river and harbor appropriation bill, finding itself without a quorum, had directed him to report the names of the absentees to the House.

Mr. CONGER. I ask the Speaker to report the number of members present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk informs the Chair that one hundred and forty-three members have answered to their names.

Mr. CONGER. I simply desire——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan will recall the fact that under the rule nothing is in order until after the completion of the report of the Committee of the Whole has been made to the House.

Mr. CONGER. It might facilitate business if the House would listen to me by consent for a few moments.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to say that, as far as I am concerned myself, I will withdraw any point which I may have made if it shall occur again as to there being no quorum, and allow the bill to go on to its completion. I desire to say, however, in justice to myself that I did feel that after the committee had by some neglect of its own or its clerk not before it the reports for this improvement, and when and after I had gone before them, and presented the case clearly as their members will admit, and yet they failed to put it in before the bill was printed, and then said it should be inserted afterward, after they had got along with the bill, in which statement I am corroborated by at least one member of the committee—I say that I did feel that under such circumstances one-half of the appropriation that the committee were willing to give at all events should be allowed. This is a meritorious case, I think, and it is different from many other cases, because it was an oversight on the part of the committee, and I say that the committee having the report before it, and its omission being an oversight, it should have been put on the bill by consent of the committee.

Having said so much, I desire now to say that I shall not make the point of no quorum, and am willing that the bill, for the sake of all and for the interest of the improvement of the rivers and harbors, shall go on to its completion; and therefore I withdraw the point of order and hope the committee will proceed with the consideration of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will now report the names of the absentees to the House under the rule. The Chair will then entertain the motion that the committee resume its sittings; which the Chair doubts not will be entertained.

Mr. WAIT. I would ask if we cannot by unanimous consent dispense with further proceedings in this direction?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not in the power of the Chair to alter the rule of the House, which says that the names of the absentees shall be reported to the House.

Mr. TALBOTT. I move to dispense with all further proceedings under the call.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Maryland will remember that there has been no call of the House ordered.

Mr. REED. I rise to a parlimentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. REED. Cannot the reading of the names of absentees be dispensed with by unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. By unanimous consent that portion of the report of the chairman of the Committee of the Whole House can be dispensed with. Does the gentleman make the request?

Mr. REED. I do.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Maine asks unanimous consent that that portion of the report of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be dispensed with.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection being made, the Clerk will report the names of absentees to the House.

The Clerk reported the following members as having failed to answer to their names:

Mr. REAGAN rose.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio. Is it in order to move that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There has been no call of the House, and the motion would not be in order.

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman from Texas yields to me, that I may report for printing and recommitment a general appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the gentleman from Georgia making a report from the Committee on Appropriations?

There was no objection.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BLOUNT, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill (H. R. No. 7203) making appropriations for the sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, recommitted to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The report which has just been made to the House from the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union does not show a quorum present.

Mr. HAZELTON. I move that there be a call of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that the necessity for the House to go back immediately into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union only arises in the event of the call of the roll disclosing the presence of a quorum.

Mr. REAGAN. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to proceed with the consideration of the river and harbor appropriation bill.

Mr. HAZELTON. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HAZELTON. My inquiry is, whether we cannot send out for the absentees and bring them to the bar?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is in the power of the House, if it shall so determine, to compel the attendance of every absent member.

Mr. HAZELTON. I shall not make the motion.

Mr. WILSON. It is evident there is a quorum now present. Let us go on and finish the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The point that there is no quorum has been withdrawn, and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to proceed with the consideration of the river and harbor bill.

Mr. AIKEN. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. AIKEN. It has gone on the record that there are absentees. One of my colleagues is at home sick; and I want to know when I can have the opportunity to make an excuse for him.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the rule, whenever a call of the House has been ordered and the roll has been called, it is then in order to make excuses for absent members; but no call of the House has been ordered, and the question is on the motion of the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN.]

The motion was agreed to.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, (Mr. CARLISLE in the chair,) and resumed consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 7104) making appropriations for the construction, completion, repair, and preservation of certain works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The pending question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER.]

Mr. CONGER. I withdraw that amendment. I do not wish again to test the sense of the House upon it. I will make no further effort.

Mr. HAZELTON. I ask the Chair to enforce the rule against smoking, which is very offensive to me and others.

The CHAIRMAN. The Sergeant-at-Arms will see that gentlemen comply with the rule in regard to smoking. The gentleman from Michigan withdraws his amendment.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. Now I offer my amendment to strike out the last two lines of section 1, namely, these words:

Improving Sumpawamus Inlet, New York, $5,000.

I was born in the State of New York and have never lived out of it, and I have never heard of this interesting inlet until I read it here. My object in offering this amendment, which I shall withdraw if any of my colleagues will say that of his own personal knowledge he knows of such an inlet, was to get some information in regard to it. I will ask the Clerk to read what the Evening Post of New York says of it.

The Clerk read as follows:

SUMPAWAMUS OR WAMPASUMSET?

Is it Sumpawamus or Wampasumset; and where is it? This grave and obscure question perplexed the river and harbor statesmen of the House of Representatives yesterday. The problem seems to have been still unsolved at the hour of adjournment.

Mr. CHITTENDEN, a member from Brooklyn, not altogether unfamiliar with New York and its neighborhood, had been poring over the bill which appropriates some eleven millions of dollars for all sorts of practicable and impracticable improvements of navigable and unnavigable streams, and had been discovering therein a great mass of hitherto unsuspected geographical details. Coming at last to his own State, and being commendably anxious to add to his stock of knowledge, he innocently asked Mr. REAGAN, of Texas, who had charge of the bill, where Sumpawamus or Wampasumset Inlet was, for which he observed an appropriation of $5,000 was made. The ignorance of Mr. CHITTENDEN is pardonable, because very few of his constituents could answer his question, if indeed there is one who could do so.

Mr. REAGAN's answer, however, was prompt and specific. Expressing his surprise and regret that "the gentleman was so illy acquainted with the geography of his own city," [laughter in the House at Mr. CHITTENDEN's expense,] Mr. REAGAN informed him that Sumpawamus was "an inlet of the East River in the upper portion of the city of New York." This is one report of Mr. REAGAN's description, which is imperfect because it omits to say whether the inlet is from the East River to Central Park or Madison Square or the proposed site of the World's Fair. According to another report the description was more precise. "Sumpawamus Inlet," Mr. REAGAN said, "was an offshoot of the East River into Long Island." These two reports place Sumpawamus or Wampasumset on opposite sides of the river. After a careful process of collation, comparison, and an analysis, we have arrived at the conclusion that what Mr. REAGAN had in mind was an inlet or offshoot between the East River and Long Island Sound.

We are not surprised to learn that poor Mr. CHITTENDEN was "stunned for a moment" upon the delivery of this authentic information. The only wonder is that he recovered during the session. Within his knowledge and memory and those of everybody else in New York and Brooklyn, including the oldest inhabitant of either town, the only inlet or offshoot between the East River and the Sound is Hell Gate. It should be remembered, however, that Mr. REAGAN comes from the far-off State of Texas. There might be in the State of New York a very considerable stream whose exact situation was not familiar to him—just as there are in Texas swelling floods six inches deep, which the river and harbor bill is intended to make navigable by Mr. BLAINE's first-class subsidy steamships, but of which we of New York know nothing. Mr. COVERT came promptly to the relief of Mr. REAGAN and Mr. CHITTENDEN. Mr. COVERT is a Representative from Long Island, and is "to the manner born" in respect to inlets. He may be accepted as an expert. The members therefore pricked up attentive ears, as who should say, Now we shall hear all about it. "Sumpawamus Inlet," Mr. COVERT said, "was the chief means of communication between the Sound and the Great South Bay." Strange to say, instead of being more stunned than ever, Mr. CHITTENDEN rapidly recovered. It is reported that he walked away entirely satisfied, and locked with Mr. COVERT in a fraternal embrace.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. REAGAN. The gentleman from New York, after having had that article read, will no doubt sleep soundly and sweetly. I ask for a vote.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I desire to have the rest of the article read.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired. Does he ask leave to have printed the remainder of the article?

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I will withdraw the amendment if I can have the remainder of that article read.

The CHAIRMAN. It cannot be read except by consent. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DUNN. I rise to oppose the amendment, and yield my time to the gentleman from New York.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Objection was made.

Mr. KEIFER rose and said: I desire to have read as a part of my remarks the remainder of that article.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York has withdrawn his amendment.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I have changed my mind as to that and renew the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas proposes to yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York. Is there objection?

Mr. REAGAN. There is. I do not wish the time of the committee to be trifled with.

Mr. KEIFER. I thought that I was recognized.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did recognize the gentleman.

Mr. KEIFER. I want to have the remainder of the article read as a part of my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. KEIFER,] then, proposes to continue the argument in support of the amendment?

Mr. KEIFER. In opposition to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not understand these remarks to be in opposition to the amendment. The article was sent up to be read by the gentleman who offers the amendment. Is there objection?

Mr. REAGAN. I object.

Mr. DIBRELL. The gentleman from New York [Mr. VAN VOORHIS] has withdrawn the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thought so; but the gentleman from New York says he did not withdraw his amendment.

Mr. TALBOTT. The gentleman from New York certainly did withdraw it.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I said that I would withdraw my amendment, but I did not know that I was recognized to do so.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the gentleman from New York to withdraw his amendment.

Mr. KEIFER. If the amendment is withdrawn, then I renew it, and in support of the amendment I ask the Clerk to read as a portion of my remarks the remainder of the article sent up by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. VAN VOORHIS.]

The Clerk read as follows:

We confess, however, that we are by no means satisfied. The Sound is on the northern side of Long Island, and the Great South Bay is on the southern side. An inlet or strait or whatever connecting these two bodies of water is shut up to three courses. It must pass by way of Sandy Hook, the Narrows, the East River, and Hell Gate, or it must go around in the neighborhood of Montauk Point, or it must cut across the mainland of Long Island. The last is the most direct course and perhaps Sumpawamus prefers it. At least that is what we should do if we were in Sumpawamus's place. The next time Mr. COVERT rises to address the House on this important subject we wish he would lay down the course of the inlet distinctly. Does it skirt Garden City or pierce the heart of Jamaica? We have consulted the most complete gazetteer published, and can find nothing about Sumpawamus or Wampasumset. An examination of the map of Long Island in Colton's Atlas discloses no such inlet from the South Bay or the Sound to the curious and anxious eye.

While we are awaiting the solution of this puzzling problem of identity, it may be said that this alleged inlet very fairly characterizes the river and harbor bill, both in respect to vagueness and wastefulness. Anybody who knows anything of the character and manners of Long Island inlets knows that it is their confirmed habit to open and close with exasperating suddenness. If one is carefully dredged this week, it may be shut up tight next week. Spending money in its improvement is burying money in the sand. What is literally true of Long Island inlets is figuratively true of the river and harbor bill.

[The reading of the above was frequently interrupted by loud laughter.]

Mr. KEIFER. I now withdraw the amendment.

Mr. HAWLEY. I renew the amendment, and ask for a vote on it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. To strike out Sumpawamus?

The question was taken upon striking out the item of $5,000 for improving Sumpawamus Inlet, New York, and upon a viva voce vote the Chairman announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. COVERT. I call for a division on that. [Laughter.]

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 38, noes 57.

No further count being called for, the motion to strike out was not agreed to.

Mr. HAWLEY. I have a very brief personal explanation to make. When I made the motion to strike out I forgot that I was paired, and was unable to vote in support of my own motion.

Mr. BURROWS. I move to amend by adding to section 1 the following:

Harbor of refuge at New Buffalo, Michigan, $10,000.

I know the committee will need simply to hear read the resolution of the Legislature of the State of Michigan which I send to the Clerk's desk to give its support to this amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution asking Congress for an appropriation in money to secure an efficient harbor at New Buffalo, in the County of Berrien, and State of Michigan.

Whereas Congress has heretofore made appropriations for the establishment and improvement of the harbor of New Buffalo, Berrien County, Michigan; and

Whereas the said improvements are now rapidly going to decay and the harbor to ruin; and

Whereas the position of said New Buffalo (it being near the head of Lake Michigan) is a valuable one for a harbor of refuge for vessels in violent storms; and

Whereas the proper officers of the United States Government having in charge the improvement of lake harbors have heretofore officially reported that an efficient harbor could be made at said New Buffalo by the expenditure of a comparatively moderate sum, and thereby the property of the Government be preserved, a necessary harbor of refuge established, a once important shipping port renewed, and commercial interests developed and fostered: Now, therefore,

Be it resolved by the senate and house of representatives of the State of Michigan, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress are respectfully and earnestly requested to use all honorable means to procure the necessary appropriation to preserve improvements already made and to secure an efficient harbor at said New Buffalo; and

Resolved, That the governor be, and hereby is, requested to transmit a copy of the foregoing resolution to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

MOREAU S. CROSBY,
President of the Senate.
WILLIAM BALL,
Speaker pro tempore of the House of Representatives.

(Original approved by the governor.)

Mr. BURROWS. I trust the committee will adopt the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read the following:

SEC. 2. That the joint resolution approved July 20, 1868, authorizing the construction of the bridge over the Mississippi River "to connect the island of Rock Island with the cities of Davenport and Rock Island," is hereby so amended as to require the Chicago, Rock Island, and Pacific Railroad Company to charge for any cars carrying freight other than its own, and for its own cars when carrying freight for other roads, which it may carry across said bridge, the sum of $5 for every car, and for each empty car other than its own the sum of $2, one-half of which sums shall be paid by said railroad company into the Treasury of the United States each month; and the monthly returns thus made shall be in such form, and with such authentication, as the Secretary of War shall direct.

Mr. WARNER. I suggest that this section should read "not exceeding the sum of $5 for every car." Do not compel this railroad company to charge $5 for every car.

Mr. PRICE. I have an amendment which will cover that, and which I offer after consultation with the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, and which will make this section conform more nearly to what the committee desire. It is to strike out "five," and insert the words "only three," before the words "dollars for every car;" strike out the words, "and for each empty car other than its own, the sum of two dollars;" also strike out "one-half," and insert in lieu thereof "two-fifths."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following:

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of War is hereby directed, at his discretion, to cause examinations or surveys, or both, and estimates of cost of improvements proper, to be made at the following points, namely:

Mr. HAWLEY. As a matter of form I move to strike out the paragraph just read, simply that I may submit a suggestion or two. I am opposed to this bill and shall vote against it, and will briefly give my reasons. I have no doubt whatever that the people of the whole country are perfectly willing to give very liberal appropriations for this purpose. And I do not impeach the patriotism or integrity of the members of the Committee on Commerce. But I am bound to say here that this bill blossoms with items of which, in my opinion, the American Congress ought to be ashamed.

I believe that the plan of preparing these bills and acting on this whole subject is open to very serious objections. I will mention one of them. We are constantly told here that the engineers recommend such and such and such an improvement. Now, that is not quite accurate; it is not quite just to the engineers. Read the clause in question here:

That the Secretary of War is hereby directed, at his discretion, to cause examinations or surveys, or both, and estimates of cost of improvements proper, to be made at the following points.

Now, the engineers are not thereby directed to express any opinion upon the wisdom or unwisdom of any of these improvements.

Mr. REAGAN. They do it.

Mr. HAWLEY. They are sent to Sumpawamus, and God knows where else, to report what can be done to make the stream navigable for push-boats, or any improvement which it is desired shall be made. The engineer is directed to go there and make some kind of a report. He asks the people there what they want to have done, and they tell him that they want to have the stream made so that it can be navigable for boats so many feet in length, drawing so many inches, old-fashioned stern-wheel steamers, push-boats, or whatever they may desire. The engineer goes to work to ascertain how it can be done. He finds that the whole thing would require the digging of a canal around some rapids, and if that is done it would cost a million of dollars. He makes his reports and prepares his sketches and maps showing a complete survey.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. And always expresses an opinion whether it should be done.

Mr. HAWLEY. He does not express an opinion about it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I take issue with the gentleman; the reports of the engineers show that.

Mr. HAWLEY. I do not think they all do.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. All that I have read.

Mr. HAWLEY. They say what the people want, and what should be done if that want is to be gratified; but they do not in all cases say that it would be wise to do it. For that reason, in my opinion, these reports of the engineers are quoted, as a general rule, simply to show what a certain improvement would cost; but the engineers are not to be held responsible for the wisdom or the unwisdom of the improvement.

One single point more. I am not prepared to accept all these engineers as good advisers upon these matters, any way as disinterested advisers, because much of this work is done by civil engineers employed by the War Department, the regular engineers of the Army being unable to do it all. Now, these civil engineers have the conduct of the whole affair, the expenditure of the money appropriated, and they are employed year after year in spending this money. These civil engineers are like other persons, desiring business and occupation, and many of them are willing to spend a million of dollars on some improvement, at the rate of a hundred thousand dollars a year, if it will give them employment for ten years. So they are liable to be misled upon this matter as are many others.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HAWLEY. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. PACHECO. I move to amend by inserting the following:

Harbor of San Luis Obispo, California.

This is one of our important harbors. I hope the amendment will be adopted.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Old Town Creek from where it empties into Tombigbee River to opposite Verona.

Mr. REAGAN. Some gentleman has indicated on my bill that Old Town Creek appears in two places in the bill. I therefore move to strike out this paragraph and insert the following, which was inadvertently omitted in drawing the bill:

Bear Creek, running into the Yazoo River.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. HENDERSON. I move to amend by inserting the following:

Harbor at Port Huron, on Lake Champlain.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WHITE. I move to amend by inserting the following:

Clarion River, from its mouth to its source.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Survey for harbor of refuge in Lake Pepin, at Stockholm, Wisconsin, and Lake City, Minnesota.

Mr. WASHBURNE. I offer the following amendment:

Insert after "Lake City," in line 27, "and at Beaver Bay." Add at end of same line, "and at the port near the boundary-line between Minnesota and the Dominion of Canada."

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I move to amend by striking out the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The whole section has not yet been read; it is being read by clauses.

The Clerk read as follows:

Maunce River from Delaware Bay to Millville, Cumberland County.

Mr. O'NEILL. I move to amend by striking out "Maunce" and inserting "Maurice."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Staunton River from Brook Neal, in Campbell County, to mouth of Pig Iron River, Virginia.

Mr. REAGAN. I move to amend by striking out the word "Iron."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Roanoke River from Gaston, North Carolina, to Clarksville, Virginia.

Mr. YEATES. I move to amend by inserting the following:

Oregon Inlet, in Dare County, North Carolina, and staking and buoying the same.

The Legislature of North Carolina has requested this House to adopt this provision. Through Oregon Inlet the waters of four or five of our large sounds pass to the ocean.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Bar at mouth of Wingate Bay, near Georgetown, South Carolina.

Mr. RICHARDSON, of South Carolina. I move to amend by striking out "Wingate" and inserting "Winyah."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Young's, Lewis', Clarke's, and Skipanon Rivers, entering into Young's Bay, in the county of Clatsop, near mouth of Columbia River, Oregon.

Mr. WHITEAKER. The proper name of one of these rivers is "Lewis and Clarke's River." I move therefore to amend by inserting the word "and" after the word "Lewis."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Lynn Harbor, Massachusetts.

Mr. BRIGGS. I move to amend by inserting the following:

Merrimac River, from Lawrence, Massachusetts, to Manchester, New Hampshire.

This amendment has been submitted to members of the Committee on Commerce, and there is no objection to it.

Mr. KENNA. I hope the amendment will be adopted.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DE LA MATYR. I now move my amendment to the third section, in line 66, and I ask the Clerk to read it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Indian River, Florida, at North End, in view of opening a passage into the Lagoon one-half mile.

Mr. DE LA MATYR. Gentlemen who have examined it say it is an important matter, and I hope it will be accepted. An immense trade in fruit needs to go out that way. A small expense will open the way, and I hope this will be permitted to be surveyed.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPARKS. I move to strike out the whole section.

The CHAIRMAN. It has not been read through yet.

Mr. SPARKS. It think it has.

The CHAIRMAN. No; it has not. The Committee on Commerce has reported various amendments to it which will first be disposed of, and then the Chair will entertain the motion to strike out the entire section.

Mr. SPARKS. Very well; I will move to strike it out when the section has been read through.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will now read the amendments reported from the Committee on Commerce.

The Clerk read as follows:

Potomac and Anacostia Rivers, in the vicinity of Washington, District of Columbia, with reference to the improvement of navigation, the establishment of the harbor-line, and the flats, so far as their improvement may be necessary to the improvement of navigation and the establishment of the harbor-line.

Mouth of Cedar River, Green Bay, Michigan.

Greenport Harbor, New York.

Mr. McLANE. There should be an amendment after the word "and," so as to make it read "and the raising of the flats." That was the intention of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendments of the committee, as amended, were agreed to.

Mr. BURROWS. I move to insert the following:

Survey for harbor of refuge at New Buffalo, Michigan.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POEHLER. I move to add the following:

Headwaters of Cannon River, in Minnesota, with a view that the same may be added to the reservoir system of the Upper Mississippi.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 37, noes 12.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RICHARDSON, of South Carolina. I move the following:

Water connection between the Waccamaw and Cape Fear Rivers, with a view of ascertaining if a continued inland water connection can thereby be established.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 30, noes 19.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. YEATES. I move the following:

Oregon Inlet, in Dare County, North Carolina.

I ask the Clerk to read the resolutions of the Legislature of North Carolina.

The Clerk read as follows:

A resolution asking a survey of Oregon Inlet, in Dare County, by the United States Government, and for buoying and staking the same.

Resolved by the house of representatives, (the senate concurring,) 1. That our Senators and Representatives in Congress shall be, and they are hereby, requested to use their influence to obtain a survey of Oregon Inlet, in Dare County, North Carolina, and to have the same buoyed and staked at as early a day as possible.

2. That after the passage of this resolution, copies thereof shall be immediately sent to the representation for North Carolina in Congress.

3. That this resolution shall be in force from and after its passage.

---

STATE OF NORTH CAROLINA, OFFICE SECRETARY OF STATE,
Raleigh, North Carolina, February 7, 1881.

I, W. L. Saunders, secretary of state, hereby certify that the foregoing is a true copy from the record in this office.

[SEAL.] W. L. SAUNDERS,
Secretary of State.

Mr. VALENTINE. That amendment has been submitted and voted down.

The CHAIRMAN. It was submitted, the Chair thinks, for an appropriation, and it is now submitted for a survey.

Mr. YEATES. It is not the same amendment.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. I rise to oppose this amendment. The Engineer Department have now three hundred and fifty works under way. Most of these are continuing works, and if we add forty or fifty new surveys you are laying the foundation of a great deal of trouble for the next Committee on Commerce. I have some pity for them, and I hope we will stop here.

Mr. YEATES. I wish to say that the waters of Albemarle, Currituck, Croatan, and Roanoke Sounds go through that inlet into the ocean. The work is of vast importance to all that section of the country, one of the richest and most fertile in North Carolina.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 27, noes 39.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WILLIS. If there is any objection to the amendment I send up I will withdraw it at once. [Laughter.]

Survey of headwaters of the Nile.

[Laughter.]

Mr. BURROWS. I object.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HURD. I move the following:

Toledo, Ohio, for a strait channel to Lake Erie.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 42, noes 37.

So the amendment was adopted.

Mr. McCOID. I move the following:

Des Moines River, from the city of Keokuk to the city of Des Moines.

After consultation with some of the members of the committee, I offer that amendment and think it should be adopted.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 32, noes 38.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. TALBOTT. I move the following:

Bush River, in the State of Maryland.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 12, noes 37.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SPARKS. My motion is to strike out the section.

The CHAIRMAN. Amendments to the section must first be voted on.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. We will not get through before to-morrow noon if we go on in this way.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair must obey the rules, and is not responsible for how long it takes.

Mr. CONGER. I move the following:

For a harbor at Caseville, Saginaw Bay, Lake Huron.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Illinois. I move the following:

The Calumet River, from South Chicago to the village of Pullman, on Lake Calumet.

That is a short distance of about two and one-half miles. There are on these waters twenty manufactories and 5,000 employés. I hope the amendment will be adopted.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. WARNER. I offer the following amendment:

For ice-piers at Pomeroy and Middleport, on the Ohio River.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. HORR. Mr. Chairman, in reference to these amendments I wish to say that if this thing goes on it will take more money to make these surveys than there is in the entire appropriation bill for these improvements. I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion of the gentleman is not in order at this time. The gentleman will remember that the bill has not yet been read through.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to make an appeal to gentlemen who are offering these amendments to let us conclude this matter. There is an unusual number of these amendments being offered. I trust it will be the order of the House to go on with the bill and let us report it to the House without further delay.

Mr. WHITE. I move to insert the following:

Clarion River from its mouth to Ridgway.

Mr. VALENTINE. Upon that I make a point of order.

Mr. WHITE. I desire to say that this is one of the important rivers in Western Pennsylvania, an important tributary to the Allegheny——

Mr. VALENTINE. I hope the point of order will be decided before the gentleman proceeds with his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska will state his point of order.

Mr. VALENTINE. I make the point of order that this amendment has been voted upon already by the committee and rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. If that is correct the point of order is well taken.

Mr. WHITE. Excuse me; it is not correct, Mr. Chairman. The former amendment was to provide for a survey from the mouth of the river to its source. This is for a survey from the mouth of the river to the town of Ridgway, quite a different thing.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it is a different proposition.

Mr. WHITE. In reference to this matter I wish to say a word. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"] This river is one on which there are thousands of men employed in the lumber business and in the manufacture of boats and barges. Barges are made here—[cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"] I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that this is an important river in Western Pennsylvania, and has an important commerce upon it. Hundreds of boats and barges are manufactured annually there, and I want a survey made to determine the capability of the river for improvement, with a view to an appropriation hereafter. [Laughter.] That is what I want it surveyed for. I want to put it upon the same basis as the other amendments that have been incorporated in this bill.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 10, noes 37.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. CLYMER. I wish to offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the survey of all streams in Pennsylvania not longer than five miles and not deeper than six inches.

[Laughter.]

Mr. CLYMER. I want to give all these creeks a chance.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. I desire now to have the fourth section of this bill read.

The CHAIRMAN. It will be read at the proper time.

Mr. SPARKS. I now move to strike out the third section, and I wish to say a word in that connection.

The great trouble in these river and harbor bills arises from provisions in them identical in import with the section now under consideration. By this section authority is given to survey a lot of contemptible little creeks and utterly useless harbors, that were they in the present bill, notorious and objectionable as it is for a violation of all propriety and constitutional restriction, would now be discarded from it, yet being brought in here simply for survey and report are allowed to go through. Now I warn gentlemen that if this section is allowed to remain as a part of the bill these creeks and harbors will have advocates urging appropriations for them at the next session in the next Congress, and they will then and there, under this system of omnibus legislation that has sanctioned the scores of like creeks and harbors in the present bill, come in for a share of the general plunder. At least such has been the experience of the past, and there is nothing that gives promise for the future that a like policy will not be pursued. I hope the section will be stricken out.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. As the gentleman did not occupy the entire five minutes, I wish to occupy the remainder of it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has not yielded the floor.

Mr. SPARKS. I have concluded what I wish to say, and do not yield to anybody.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I have a right to occupy the balance of the five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has not the right. The gentleman might move an amendment, if he so desires, and under the rule he would have five minutes.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. Then I move to strike out the fifth line. I wish to say that it costs money to make these surveys. The last river and harbor bill ordered about one hundred and twenty of them. These cost $150,000. Now, out of these one hundred and twenty surveys there were only about four that were of any use whatever, which have been incorporated in this bill. We have already a provision made for eighty in this printed bill, and probably twenty more have been added. It will take $100,000 for these surveys. Why do we want to make these surveys at all? Here is "Bear Creek" that is to be surveyed at a large expense. "Old Town Creek" is to be surveyed also at great expense. Corsica Creek, Dog Island Harbor, and every other dog thing under heaven is to be surveyed and at the expense of the United States! I hope the motion of the gentleman from Illinois will be adopted.

I withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPARKS] to strike out the whole of the third section.

The motion was not agreed to.

The Clerk read the fourth and last section of the bill, as follows:

SEC. 4. That for the examinations and surveys herein provided for, and for incidental repairs of harbors for which there is no special appropriation, the sum of $100,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated; and in every case where examinations or surveys are made, the report thereon shall embrace such information concerning the commercial importance, present and prospective, of the improvement contemplated thereby, and such general commercial statistics as the Secretary of War may be able to procure.

Mr. SPARKS. I move to strike out the fourth section.

The motion to strike out was not agreed to.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. I move to strike out all after the enacting clause and substitute what I send to the desk.

Mr. REAGAN. Does the gentleman wish to have that acted on now?

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. I desire it to be acted on now. I do not wish to occupy any time.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

"That $7,000,000 be, and are hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War in the improvement of the rivers and harbors of the United States."

Mr. REAGAN. I move that the committee rise and report the bill and amendments to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WARNER. I give notice that I reserve the right to call the yeas and nays on any amendments.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. BLACKBURN having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. CARLISLE reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 7104) making appropriations for the construction, completion, repair, and preservation of certain works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, and had instructed him to report the bill and amendments to the House with the recommendation that the amendments be concurred in and the bill passed.

Mr. REAGAN. I move the previous question on the bill and amendments.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. KENNA. I move to reconsider the vote by which the previous question was ordered; and also move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. REAGAN. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask unanimous consent that the adjournment be till twelve o'clock.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House has already ordered that when it adjourns to-day it be to meet at eleven o'clock on Thursday.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Was there a reconsideration?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk informs the Chair that a motion to reconsider was made and laid upon the table.

The motion of Mr. REAGAN was agreed to; and accordingly (at two o'clock and fifteen minutes a. m., Thursday, February 17) the House adjourned until Thursday at eleven o'clock a. m.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, February 16, 1881.

The Senate met at eleven o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

POTOMAC LONG BRIDGE.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the commissioners of the District of Columbia, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 14th instant, a report of the damage done to the Long Bridge by the recent flood in the Potomac, and whether in repairing the same some method cannot be adopted that will diminish the probability of inundations of the city hereafter; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a communication from the Auditor of Railroad Accounts, setting forth facts and figures which in his judgment require an amendment of the sinking fund act of May 7, 1878, so far as relates to the Central Pacific Railroad Company; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a communication from the Commissioner of Patents relative to the necessity of an additional appropriation to continue the photolithographing of the drawings for the current weekly issues of patents during the present fiscal year; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. HILL, of Colorado, presented a petition of citizens of Durango, La Plata County, Colorado, praying for the establishment of a new land district and that the office for said district shall be located in the city of Durango; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. EATON presented the petition of E. L. Perry, of New York, praying for the extension of his patent on monitor rafts; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, presented the petition of the Grand Lodge of Good Templars of Wisconsin, officially signed, praying for a constitutional amendment to prohibit the manufacture and sale of all alcoholic beverages throughout our national domain; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. LOGAN presented resolutions of the Board of Trade of Chicago, Illinois, favoring an appropriation for the construction of a harbor of refuge in Milwaukee Bay, on the west side of Lake Michigan; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. WINDOM presented the petition of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Minnesota, officially signed, praying for a constitutional amendment to prohibit the manufacture and sale of all alcoholic beverages throughout our national domain; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented resolutions of the Chamber of Commerce of Duluth, Minnesota, favoring an increased appropriation for the completion of the harbor of refuge at Grand Marais, for the establishment of a light at that harbor, and for a survey of the port at the boundary line and at Beaver Bay; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. PLATT presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of Connecticut; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, as follows:

STATE OF CONNECTICUT, OFFICE OF SECRETARY OF STATE,
General Assembly, January Session, A. D. 1881.

Senate joint resolution No. 38, concerning the New London navy-yard.

Whereas by invitation of Congress the State of Connecticut conveyed, A. D. 1868, by deed of gift, to the United States a tract of land on the river Thames for naval purposes; and

Whereas the Government has expended large sums of money on the same in grading the grounds, constructing a large wharf, erecting storehouses, &c.; and

Whereas Congress at its last session authorized the erection thereon of a building to be used as a drill-room for the apprentices of the naval training-school, to be completed at an early day; and

Whereas the adoption of another site which has been suggested would involve large and unnecessary expense to the Government: Therefore,

Resolved by this Assembly, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be requested to exert their most earnest and determined efforts to prevent the removal of said naval training-school from its location on the Thames and from this State.

Resolved, That a copy of this preamble and resolution be forwarded by the secretary of State to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

Passed February 10, 1881.

STATE OF CONNECTICUT, ss.,
Office of Secretary of State.

I hereby certify that the foregoing is a true copy of record in this office.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the seal of said State at Hartford this 11th day of February, A. D. 1881.

[SEAL.] CHARLES E. SEARLE,
Secretary of State.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. PUGH, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1856) for the relief of Mrs. J. P. Williams, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. GROOME, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 2059) for the relief of Frank D. Yates and others, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. TELLER, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 4434) for the relief of Mrs. Martha Bridges, of Bartow County, Georgia, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. HARRIS, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1996) for the relief of W. A. Reid, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. EATON, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1359) for the relief of Louis P. Di Cesnola, late consul at Cyprus, reported it without amendment.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2705) for the relief of Joseph Clymer, of Texas, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. McMILLAN. I desire as a member of the Committee on Claims to note my dissent from the report just submitted by the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. PENDLETON, from the Select Committee to examine the several branches of the Civil Service, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 2006) to regulate and improve the civil service of the United States, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. ALLISON. I am instructed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 301) for the relief of William R. Wilmer, to report it favorably, and as it will take but a moment I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration. If it takes more than a moment, I shall not press it.

Mr. TELLER. I propose to object to every bill, I do not care whether it takes a minute or a week, until there is a disposition to go to the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. ALLISON. I appeal to my friend to withdraw his objection.

Mr. TELLER. I enter an objection at this time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The consideration of the bill is objected to, and it will go on the Calendar.

Mr. McPHERSON, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 2002) to regulate the promotion of midshipmen and cadet-engineers, and establish the grade of sub-assistant engineer in the Navy, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom the subject was referred, reported a joint resolution (S. R. No. 161) authorizing Commodore R. W. Shufeldt, of the United States Navy, to accept a sword, a Persian carpet, and other articles from the Sultan of Zanzibar; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. ALLISON, from the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 6529) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, and for the armament thereof, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments.

Mr. WHYTE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 4607) for the relief of Passed Assistant Engineer Absalom Kirby, of the Navy, reported it without amendment.

ISTHMUS SHIP-CANALS.

Mr. EATON. The Committee on Foreign Relations have instructed me to offer a resolution; which I desire to have read, printed, and laid on the table.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c., That the interests of the people of the United States of America and the welfare and security of their Government are so involved in the subject of the construction of ship-canals and other ways for the transportation of sea-going vessels across the isthmus connecting North and South America that the Government of the United States with the frankness which is due to all other people and governments hereby asserts that it will insist that its consent is a necessary condition precedent to the execution of any such project; and also as to the rules and regulations under which other nations shall participate in the use of such canals or other ways, either in peace or in war.

Mr. WINDOM. I desire to give notice while that resolution is pending before the Senate, that at some convenient time before the close of this session I shall desire to submit some remarks to the Senate on that subject.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will lie on the table and be printed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. KERNAN asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 2190) for the relief of John H. Templeton; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. CALL (by request) asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 2191) for the relief of Captain and Brevet-Colonel Alexander E. Drake, of the United States Army; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. COKE, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported an amendment intended to be proposed to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. EATON, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, reported an amendment intended to be proposed to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BAYARD, from the Committee on Finance, reported an amendment intended to be proposed to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MAXEY and Mr. SAUNDERS submitted amendments intended to be proposed by them respectively to the bill (H. R. No. 7101) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes; which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BROWN and Mr. BAILEY submitted amendments intended to be proposed by them respectively to the bill (H. R. No. 7104) making appropriations for the construction, completion, repair, and preservation of certain works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HARRIS submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 7035) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BAILEY submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the post-route bill; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

ADJUSTMENT OF PENSION APPLICATIONS.

Mr. INGALLS. I ask that the resolution which I offered on a previous day relative to the appointment of a select committee to examine the condition of the pension laws may be reported.

The Chief Clerk read the following resolution, submitted by Mr. INGALLS on the 9th instant:

Resolved, That a committee of three Senators be appointed by the Chair, to sit during the recess of the Senate, with power to employ a clerk and stenographer, for the purpose of inquiring into the state of the law relative to the adjustment of pensions, with authority to report at the next session of the Senate, by bill or otherwise, what measures are necessary to secure the early adjudication of all applications for pensions.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. DAVIS] has offered a substitute, which I ask may be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out all after the word "resolved" and insert:

That a committee of three Senators be appointed by the Chair, to sit during the recess of the Senate, with power to employ a stenographer, who shall also act as clerk, to send for persons and papers, administer oaths, and examine witnesses, for the purpose of informing the Senate as to the defects of the present pension system, and the remedy therefor, with authority to report at the next session of the Senate, by bill or otherwise, what measures are necessary to prevent frauds and secure the early adjudication of all applications for pension.

Mr. INGALLS. The substitute offered by the Senator from West Virginia in my judgment will meet the necessities of the case better than the original resolution. It is more comprehensive and at the same time more definite, and I am willing that that shall be substituted and acted upon by the Senate.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to make to the Senator from Kansas a mere technical suggestion. This resolution now only applies to what little recess there may be between the adjournment of the Senate on the 3d of March and the convening of a new session on the 4th. I suppose it is really meant to apply to the summer recess.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I did not understand the Senator from Massachusetts. What was his suggestion?

Mr. HOAR. I suggested that the resolution should direct the committee to report at the next legislative session of the Senate and allowing it to sit during the summer recess. Otherwise this would have to be renewed at the executive session, if there be one, after the 4th of March.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I do not think it would be competent to consider this question at all at an executive session.

Mr. HOAR. Certainly it would.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. However, there is no objection to any amendment making it definite; and I suppose that will be accepted.

Mr. HOAR. I do not care anything about it.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I think it is generally understood what this means. Now, Mr. President, I wish to state, what the Senate already know, that I have been opposed to the raising of special committees; but I shall favor this one. This pension subject is one which needs attention. It is a subject in which a great many people of this country are interested; in fact almost everybody is interested either in the way of receiving a pension or paying taxes. It is a question which in my judgment ought to be looked into very carefully. I believe that there are defects and that remedies ought to be applied both to make the examinations more prompt and to prevent frauds.

I have no doubt there are a great many deserving persons who ought to have pensions who are awaiting the decisions of the Pension Office; and I have as little doubt of the other proposition that there are persons receiving pensions now who ought not to receive them; and I suggested to my friend from Kansas the amendment which has been read and which he has accepted.

I would state to the Senator that it is most probable there ought to be a still further amendment making provision for paying the little expense, for I think the expense will be but little, there will be attending this investigation. There should be some provision for paying that expense, and I know of no better way than to add an amendment saying that it shall be paid out of the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be thus modified.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I think a thousand dollars will cover the entire expense.

Mr. INGALLS. The amendment has been accepted, and the resolution modified in accordance with the suggestion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be reported as modified.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That a committee of three Senators be appointed by the Chair, to sit during the recess of the Senate, with power to employ a stenographer, who shall also act as clerk; to send for persons and papers, administer oaths, and examine witnesses, for the purpose of informing the Senate as to the defects of the present pension system, and the remedy therefor, with authority to report at the next session of the Senate, by bill or otherwise, what measures are necessary to prevent frauds and secure the early adjudication of all applications for pension, the expense thereof to be paid out of the "miscellaneous items" of the contingent fund of the Senate.

Mr. WITHERS. I had designed to call up for the consideration of the Senate the bill No. 496, reported from the Committee on Pensions, the object of which was to provide for precisely the same result that this proposed resolution seeks to attain. I do not know that I have any objection, however, to the adoption of this resolution in order that the inquiry may be made during the recess with ample time for a special committee to devote themselves exclusively to the consideration of this subject. If they can devise any scheme which will correct the evils that are now admitted to exist, I shall be very happy myself to know the fact. If the Senate adopt this resolution now offered, I shall of course assume that it is the desire of the Senate that no further action shall be had in that direction during the present session of this body.

Mr. GARLAND. With the purposes of this resolution I entirely sympathize; but I wish to ask the Senator from Kansas this question: What obstacle is there in the way of giving this authority to the Committee on Pensions?

Mr. INGALLS. There will be no Committee on Pensions after the adjournment of the present session of the Senate.

Mr. GARLAND. That may be, or may not be.

Mr. INGALLS. As a matter of fact, there will be no such committee after the adjournment of this session until committees shall be appointed at some subsequent session.

Mr. GARLAND. But we have voted down all propositions for special committees, as stated by the Senator from West Virginia; and while I am very desirous to see this examination take place, I am upon principle rather opposed to appointing special committees.

Mr. BLAIR. Of course we all sympathize with the purpose which this resolution has in view; but its adoption now is equivalent to a decision of the Senate that there shall be no further action at the present session on the bill which has been perfected with great effort and great expenditure of time by the Pensions Committee as it has previously existed, and in which investigation the honorable Senator who moved this resolution participated, and in the preparation of which bill the same Senator was quite active, and which bill he approves and has so admitted here on the floor of the Senate. That bill is now pending. At the time the discussion arose which has taken place at the present session, it was moved in the form of an amendment to the pension appropriation bill; but it is pending upon the Calendar of the Senate, and I have myself introduced a bill since that discussion which embraces, as I think, provisions that meet the substantial objections urged by all parties to the bill as reported by the Pensions Committee. Whenever that bill shall be called to the notice of the Senate, as I think it ought to be as one of the most important bills that can possibly engage its attention, the one which I have introduced, I design to move as a substitute for the measure of the committee the bill I have introduced; and I have been informed by various members of the Senate who have examined it that in their opinion it meets very largely, if not wholly, the objections which have been urged to the bill reported by the committee.

Now, Mr. President, the evil exists and the appointment of the committee contemplated by this resolution will simply postpone all possible remedy for at least two years. It is not contemplated that this special committee shall investigate any subject-matter other than that which has been the subject of careful consideration for at least a year and a half past by the Pensions Committee of the Senate. It may not be, perhaps, assumed by the movers of this resolution that any more competent parties to examine the subject-matter will be obtained by the appointment under its provisions if it should be adopted. The honorable Senator from Kansas, the mover of the resolution, has only very recently left the Pensions Committee himself, and it cannot be supposed that the committee appointed under this resolution, a committee of three, will be likely to arrive at any different results from those which are represented by the bill that was reported by the Committee on Pensions, known as Senate bill No. 496. But I believe, however that might be, that action at the present session of Congress is attainable and that it ought to be arrived at. I myself have received many letters from soldiers in all parts of the United States, or those portions of the United States where they live, strongly insisting that there shall be no postponement of this bill, that no such resolution as this introduced by the Senator from Kansas shall be allowed to pass, that there be action now, and I do not think that anything other than action at the present time will be likely to be satisfactory at all to the country.

In regard to the other point, it haa been suggested that if this matter is to be investigated at all it be left to the Pension Committee, but the further suggestion has been made that there is to be no Pension Committee in existence after the 4th of March until a new one is constituted. Every member of the Senate well understands that the committees of the Senate will be immediately appointed upon the calling of the session of the Senate to consider executive business if for no other purpose.

Mr. HOAR. Our committees die with the session.

Mr. BLAIR. They do not die with the existence of the session if they are charged with any special duty or investigation during the vacation; they then exist until the next session, but at the next session the committees, to be sure, might be remodeled, might be changed.

Mr. HOAR. My friend from New Hampshire will permit me to ask him, as I am perhaps misinformed, is it not true that the committees of this body terminate with every session, so that if the gentlemen composing the Pensions Committee were authorized to pursue an investigation in vacation it would be as a special committee still?

Mr. BLAIR. I do not understand that that changes the nature of the subject at all. It might be, and be entirely consistent with the point which I am endeavoring to make, that the committees expire with the close of each session. Admit that to be so—for I will not raise an issue or undertake to advocate any special theory in that direction—why may not the regular Pensions Committee make this inquiry if that committee must necessarily be constituted at the commencement of the executive session, because it will be called upon to consider nominations as well as other committees? For that reason that committee must be constituted at the commencement of the next session. Why may it not just as well consider this subject as any other committee; and particularly why may it not as well, since the personnel likely to compose a special committee would probably be made up of individuals who lately have left the Pensions Committee and who have considered this same subject and arrived at conclusions upon it?

It seems to me that there is no occasion, in the first place, for postponing this subject-matter for two years, because the adoption of this resolution will come to that, and many applicants for pension will die meanwhile, and immense suffering will exist all over this country in consequence of the inaction of the Senate and of the other branch of Congress. To take this course will be equivalent, as I said before, to a decision of the Senate that there shall be no remedy sought or applied by the present Congress; and if it is to be done, I for my own part see no reason in the world—certainly none has yet been adduced—why the regular Pensions Committee should not be charged with the investigation of what is its own peculiar and special business, that for which it was created, for which it exists, and but for which it has no excuse whatever for existence.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, there seems to be a disposition on the part of Senators who have favored Senate bill No. 496 to discuss the question just as though there was no other view of it except their own, and as if a great necessity had arisen that their views should be adopted. Now, I wish to notify the Senators that there are persons in the Senate who entertain very different views from those entertained by gentlemen who desire to have that bill ingrafted in the laws of this country.

I listened to the discussion and the remarks of Senators here who desire the passage of that bill, and I must say that I did not find in the arguments made by either of those Senators any suggestion of defects in any portion of the law as it now exists, or that it was not sufficient to do all that is required. I listened very patiently to the Senator from New Hampshire, and was very well entertained, too, but I must confess that no suggestion of his was made as to the weakness of the present law; but there seems to be a great desire to have some other law. That is about all I find in the arguments which have been made here in reference to this particular bill, called the sixty-surgeons bill.

The Senator from New Hampshire says a great many soldiers have written to him. I do not care about saying how many or how few have written to me. I do not care about this question being discussed here as to the views of soldiers on one side and the views of soldiers on the other side. That is not the importance of it. The importance of it is to get legislation, if you desire any, which shall accomplish certain objects. I do not think this bill will secure what is desired, and when the subject was under discussion I gave the reasons for my opinion. I think quite a number of those who have discussed the question have discussed it from the stand-point of economy, from an apprehension of some great imaginary wrong that is being perpetrated which they know nothing about. I do not apply that to the committee, however, but to the remarks of some other Senators.

So far as I am concerned, I am utterly opposed to any legislation of this character, for reasons which I have already given, because I do not believe that it will be beneficial to the pensioner, to the applicant for a pension, or to the Government. If there is a great desire to know what is necessary to be done, if anything is necessary to be done, to amend the law so as to make the ferreting out of frauds so complete that all frauds can be discovered, I am in favor of that; but I have not seen any proposition which satisfies my mind in that direction as yet, and I will say further to the Senator from New Hampshire that my judgment is that you can pass no bill of that character at this session; and to try it is only taking up time unnecessarily. There is not such a great necessity for any such law, and in fact no necessity in my judgment.

If Senators will tell us when they are discussing this proposition what the defects in the present law are, then we can know something about a remedy; but they do not tell us. They seem to confine themselves to admiring the beauty of the structure which they themselves have builded in reference to the granting of pensions, and not to expose the deformity of the structure which has now been builded by others. I should like to know something in that direction if we are to legislate.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. This resolution appears to assume that there are defects in the present law; and the object, if there be any object, in adopting the resolution is to ascertain what those defects are and to recommend a better system.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well. I have not mentioned this resolution. I was speaking about the design on the part of Senators who seek to pass the bill referred to, which has been once voted down in the Senate. I will come to the resolution in a moment.

Mr. BLAIR. I wish, if the Senator from Illinois will permit me, as he seems to assume, in directing his remarks to me, that I am an advocate of the sixty-surgeons bill, to say that I was not a member of the Committee on Pensions when it was considered and reported by that committee; and the first time I said anything in regard to it I said I was opposed to the bill unless it was substantially modified. I say so still. My views in regard to the operation of the bill reported to the Senate are, in many regards at least, very much the same as those of the Senator from Illinois. I think it would be an impracticable measure; I do not believe it would result in the removal of scarce any of the evils that are complained of; but when so many of the members of the Senate are struck favorably with some of the features of that bill, and a protracted debate has developed almost all the evils, if not all, connected with the proposed system, and the objections which exist in the minds of Senators like the Senator from Illinois and myself to the bill, I do think that we might very readily formulate in a new bill whatever of good features there are in the old one, and also such provisions as will remedy the evils as they exist in the minds of other Senators.

As I have repeatedly said, not caring to go into its provisions at length, I have endeavored to prepare such a bill, and I think it covers whatever objections there are in the minds of the Senator from Illinois and others to Senate bill No. 496; and it seems to me that we could very readily, after a few hours discussion, pass a measure here which I think would go through the House of Representatives.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair desires to remind Senators that the morning hour has expired. Does the Senator from Illinois desire to continue his remarks?

Mr. LOGAN. I do not wish to impose on the Senate at all. I can go on at some other time. I desire, however, if this matter is to be discussed, to say much more than I have said.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution goes over with the morning hour. The Chair presumes there will be no objection to the Senator from Illinois being heard.

Mr. LOGAN. I merely desire to say in reference to the objections

I was speaking about to the law as it now exists, that the real deformities, if there are any, or the weaknesses of the law, have not been pointed out. Now, I will give my own view about what remedy would be the better one at the present time.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Will the Senator allow me to state what I think would be a good remedy?

Mr. LOGAN. Of course I will allow the Senator.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I think a good remedy would be to bring the pensioner in closer communication with the employés of the Pension Department, and I will state, to be within the mark, that dozens of claimants for pensions come to see me every time I am at home for any period of time, and come from distances of thirty or forty miles, to know what they shall do and how they shall best furnish means to hasten action on their applications. I am not particularly wedded to the sixty-surgeons bill; but any law that will bring the pensioners and pension applicants themselves in closer communication with the employés of the Department will do good. I would go for that at any expense.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not know how you can make a law to bring them in closer communication with the employés of the Department than they are.

Mr. BURNSIDE. By having pension agents in each congressional district, whose duty it should be to hasten action on these claims.

Mr. LOGAN. We have had pension agents in every congressional district, but they are not called "pension agents." We have them now, so far as that is concerned, and it does not seem to remedy the difficulty; but I will make one statement and then I will desist for the present. In regard to the Surgeon-General's Office there might be a character of legislation perhaps that would facilitate pension claims; there might be in regard to other offices legislation which might facilitate pension claims. It is impossible to facilitate pension claims when the persons who are put to the work of facilitating them desire to delay them. That is one proposition.

Unless the departments are so arranged in the Adjutant-General's Office, in the Surgeon-General's Office, and in the Pension Office that you can readily ascertain a fact that you want from the record, you cannot facilitate the business by any legislation. For instance, in the Surgeon-General's Office—I will merely suppose a case, I do not know it to exist—suppose they have to examine but one book or one set of books, and when the Pension Commissioner sends there for a report in reference to a man, whether he was wounded at a certain time, or whether he was sick at a certain time, or whether he was in a hospital at a certain time, that inquiry must wait till the examination of the hundreds that are already pending before the clerks can get at this one. How are you going to facilitate that by sending out a surgeon into the country? Does that affect the Surgeon-General's Office? Certainly not. How can you facilitate? I do not know; I am not a surgeon-general; I am not a surgeon; I do not know anything about it; but it seems to me as a business matter it could be done. I think, instead of having one book of a hospital to examine, if there were twenty books of the same kind the examination could be made very easily and at very little additional expense, for then you could use twenty persons instead of one. There is one way you could facilitate it, and a way that would facilitate it very greatly, too.

I do not wish to go into any criticism, but just to say that as the records are kept and used and examined as they are here in Washington City, your legislation will amount to nothing. Here is the place to strike, and not at the pensioners or applicants over the country.

Mr. BLAIR. I provide for that in my bill.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well, have it in the bill. That does not require a new pension law; it only requires one of the Departments of the Government to furnish the Pension Office with certain evidence. That does not change the pension law, nor does it affect it except that it may affect the facilitating of the examinations; it has nothing to do with the Pension Office except in the relation that exists between it and other Departments in obtaining evidence.

Let us go a little further. Take the War Department. If you want to facilitate the examination of these claims, give them a force and require by resolution or law that their reports shall be made immediately to the Commissioner of Pensions. Then you will facilitate the settlement of claims, but you cannot do it in this way, in my judgment at least. I do not claim to know anything more about pensions or about the pension law than anybody else here; but I will say that I have read the pension law very carefully. I may not understand it as well as some other gentlemen, but I think a better understanding of the pension law as it exists to-day by Senators would be more satisfactory if they would examine it themselves and see what the powers are that are therein contained.

Now, sir, I have no objection to this special committee being appointed. If there is anything that can be done for the purpose of facilitating the business of the offices connected with pensions, let us have it; but as for taking up bills which have been introduced here without examination, merely upon the say-so of a man who seems very desirous of having changes of some character remodeling everything so that the new machinery cannot be put in motion unless he is the engineer, I am utterly opposed to that, so far as I am concerned.

If this committee is necessary let it be appointed, not from the Committee on Pensions alone, but let a committee of three be appointed from the diverse views of this subject so that all phases of the case may be examined, and then you will probably come at a proper result.

I did not get up here to oppose the resolution; I only got up to answer some of the suggestions made by the Senator from New Hampshire in reference to taking up a new bill and trying to pass it at this session. It is entirely unnecessary to undertake that, in my judgment; you cannot do it, and it would not be wise to do it.

Several SENATORS. "Regular order!"

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The regular order is demanded.

THE FUNDING BILL.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask leave to offer an amendment to the funding bill, which I ask may be printed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be received and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WHYTE. I should like to have that amendment reported, so that we may understand it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the end of section 4 it is proposed to insert:

SEC. —. That before awarding any portion of the loan in bonds authorized by this act, the Secretary of the Treasury is directed to issue proposals for the same in the United States, and shall give not less than thirty days' public notice in two or more of the public newspapers in the city of Washington, and in such other places of the United States as he may deem advisable, designating the amount of such loan, the place and the time up to which sealed proposals will be received for the same, the periods for the payment, and the amount of each installment in which it is to be paid, if paid in installments, and the penalty for the non-payment of any such installments, and when and where such proposals shall be opened in the presence of such persons as may choose to attend; and the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to accept, if in his judgment the same shall be advantageous to the Government, the most favorable proposals offered by responsible bidders: Provided, That no offer shall be accepted at less than par: And provided further, That if the whole amount of the loan in bonds herein authorized shall not be subscribed for in the manner provided in this section, then the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to dispose of said bonds, in his discretion, at not less than par, as prescribed by the first section of this act.

SEC. —. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall report to Congress, immediately after the commencement of the next session, the amount he has borrowed under the provisions of this act, of whom, and on what terms, with an abstract of all the proposals, designating those that have been accepted and those that have been rejected, and the amount of bonds or Treasury notes that have been issued for the same.

ADDITIONAL DISTRICT POLICE.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask the Senate to consider at this time Senate bill No. 2184, which I introduced yesterday morning, providing for the appointment of additional policemen for temporary service during the inaugural period. It will not take five minutes, in my opinion, to dispose of the bill.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 2184) to authorize the commissioners of the District of Columbia to appoint additional policemen for temporary service in the District, and for other purposes.

Mr. HARRIS. The commissioners of the District have recommended to me this morning that the word "fifteen," in line 7, be stricken out, and "twenty" inserted; so as to make the term of service of these special policemen twenty days instead of fifteen days. I move that amendment.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I hardly think that ought to be done. I do not see why twenty days' service is necessary.

Mr. HARRIS. The reason assigned by the commissioners, and it seems plausible and true, is that for some days before the inauguration and for several days after the inauguration there will be a very large and unusual concourse of people assembled in this city. The commissioners will dismiss this special force just so soon as they safely can. They have no motive to retain it one moment longer than is necessary. I only propose to give them authority to keep it twenty days if necessary.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I think a week previous to and a week after the inauguration will be long enough. That is covered by the fifteen days named in the bill. I hope the Senator will not insist on the amendment. I have hardly ever known an appropriation with broad discretion where every dollar of it was not spent. I suppose the additional force is necessary, and I make no objection to that; but I do object to continuing the time of service. I hope the Senator will confine it to fifteen days; that is two weeks, a week before and a week after the inauguration.

Mr. HARRIS. I offer the amendment because it is recommended by the commissioners of the District, who are the police authority. I am perfectly content to take the judgment of the Senate upon it, and will consume no time in debating it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee to strike out "fifteen" and insert "twenty."

The amendment was agreed to; there being, on a division—ayes 32, noes 12.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on the 15th instant approved and signed the following acts:

An act (S. No. 1457) to restore the lands included in the Fort Reading and Fort Crook military reservations in the State of California to the public domain, and for other purposes;

An act (S. No. 1191) for the relief of James Monroe Heiskell, of Baltimore City, Maryland;

An act (S. No. 201) for the relief of Somerville Nicholson;

An act (S. No. 1193) granting a pension to Milton L. Sparr; and

An act (S. No. 752) granting an increase of pension to Crafts J. Wright.

EVENING SESSIONS FOR THE CALENDAR.

Mr. McDONALD. Mr. President——

Mr. TELLER. I want to call up the resolution for evening sessions if it is to be adopted. I do not desire to interfere with the Senator from Indiana who desires to submit some remarks. I think we can take a vote upon the resolution at once. It was amended yesterday.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Colorado asks that the Senate further consider the resolution which was considered yesterday. It will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That on and after Thursday, the 17th instant, the Senate will take a recess and meet again at half past seven p. m. of the same day, to consider the cases on the Calendar, unless upon motion the Senate shall otherwise order; and bills that are not objected to shall be taken up in their order, and each Senator shall be entitled to speak once and for five minutes only upon any question; and the objection may be interposed at any stage of the proceedings.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. WHYTE. The effect of that resolution is to require unanimous consent to take up any bill, and to get rid of that, if it is possible, I move to strike out the words:

And bills that are not objected to shall be taken up in their order.

And insert in lieu thereof:

The States shall be called in alphabetical order, and as each is called the Senators in the order named by the presiding officer may move the consideration of a bill, and all bills so called for, unless objected to by at least five Senators, shall be considered.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I move to amend by inserting after the words "17th instant" the words "unless otherwise ordered."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Rhode Island proposes a further amendment.

Mr. BURNSIDE. After the words "17th instant," I move to insert "unless otherwise ordered."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. This is not an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Maryland. The question is first on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. WHYTE.]

Mr. WHYTE. I only desire to say in regard to my amendment that it is the rule which has been adopted in the House of Representatives and under which they have been working for the last two or three days. It gives every State a chance, and does not require unanimous consent, but requires five objections to rule out the consideration of a bill.

Mr. HOAR. I understand that the effect of this resolution and that amendment is to introduce the previous question in the Senate and to permit a measure, against the remonstrance of four members of this body at least, to be passed with only five minutes' debate and only one Senator to speak on a side.

I do not wish to go into this question at length at this moment with the Senator from Indiana waiting; but I beg to say that I shall desire to address the Senate at great length upon this question before such an amendment as that is adopted. The Senate has carefully preserved in the Anthony rule and in all these orders for dispatching business the principle which the Senate has observed since its original inauguration, that it is not in the power of this body, against the will of a single member of it, to suppress debate on any matter of legislation, a principle deemed so important that when Mr. Clay proposed to introduce the previous question here in the first session or the second session of Mr. Tyler's administration the democratic minority threatened to resist by force and unto blood. I do not propose to enter upon that discussion; but if I understand the operation of the amendment, not the original resolution of my friend from Colorado, that is the effect of it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is the Senate ready for the question?

Mr. HOAR. I ask that the matter may go over until to-morrow. Is the matter before the Senate by unanimous consent?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution has been taken from the Calendar, having been considered yesterday.

Mr. HOAR. I will not submit to have the amendment adopted without debate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

Mr. HOAR. I trust my friend from Maryland will withdraw it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let the amendment be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

The Chief Clerk read Mr. WHYTE's amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President——

Mr. HOAR. Now, I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Vermont, as he is about to address the Senate, to the effect of that.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I see it, and that is exactly what I want to say. I should be glad to dispatch the business of the Senate, but I would rather that not a single bill shall pass between now and the 4th day of March than to introduce into this body (which is the only one where there is free debate and the only one which can under its rules discuss freely measures of importance or otherwise) a provision which does in effect operate to carry a bill either to defeat or success with only a five or fifteen minutes' debate and one or two Senators on a side speaking. I think it is of greater importance to the public interest, in the long run and in the short run, that every bill on your Calendar should fail than that any Senator should be cut off from the right of expressing his opinion and the grounds of it upon every measure that is to be voted upon here. Under all the previous rules to get on rapidly and with short debate, there was the right of every Senator, if he did not have a chance that satisfied him, to let the measure go over and be taken up in the regular way. This cuts that off and requires five Senators to prevent the operation of the gag rule against debate in this body. As much as is said about debate in this body being a nuisance,—and I admit that much of it is useless, and I contribute my full share to that and more,—there is no security for public or private interests except that in one branch or the other (I wish it were in both) of these bodies there shall be absolutely free debate at the pleasure of every Senator.

Mr. WHYTE. Mr. President, I should understand the argument of the learned Senator from Vermont if he was making this address on the 12th of February; but inasmuch as the Senator has deliberately by resolution adopted on the 12th of February limited debate upon all bills under the Anthony rule to fifteen minutes, I really think that this does not make any limitation at all; it does not certainly put any stop to debate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, my friend will pardon me. The answer to that is that under the Anthony rule, at any stage in the proceeding a single Senator can raise the objection that that bill must go over, and over it goes. The Senator having it in charge, if he is dissatisfied with having it go over on a single objection, can move to set aside the Anthony rule and take up that bill. If the Senate agrees with him and takes it up, then it is under the general rules of the Senate where a Senator has a right to free his mind to the fullest extent.

Mr. WHYTE. So it would be under this rule.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not so understand it, because you limit it that a bill shall be considered and disposed of unless five Senators agree in asking that it go over.

Mr. WHYTE. But it is in the power of a majority to control it because it is "unless otherwise ordered."

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is exactly what I am complaining of, that it shall not be in the power of a majority of the Senate to say to the minority "you shall not adopt this measure under the general rules," and that it shall not be in the power of any four Senators failing to agree with the one to stop debate and have a measure passed or rejected without a full debate and investigation.

Mr. WHYTE. Then it is better to let one Senator have the power of putting an end to the consideration of a bill than to require five Senators to do it!

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, Mr. President, no one Senator has the power to put an end to the consideration of a bill. He has the power to put an end to the gag rule stopping debate; but then it is in the power of a majority of the Senate to take it up instantly and dispose of it under the general rule which allows free debate.

Mr. WHYTE. So it is when five object.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not so understand it.

Mr. WHYTE. Oh, yes, it is. If five object a majority can overrule them.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes; but if less than five object, if four object, they can be gagged and stopped, and the measure either goes to its death or its success without any debate at all. There is where the bite comes in.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. WHYTE.]

The amendment was rejected.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question recurs on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. BURNSIDE,] after "Thursday, the 17th instant," to insert the words "unless otherwise ordered."

Mr. TELLER. If that amendment is agreed to, we might as well let the resolution go, because every night we shall have to take a recess specially or we shall have to adjourn at once. Somebody will rise and move to adjourn, and that motion will prevail. When the Senate meets in the evening it can take up anything beside the Calendar if it sees fit. My purpose is to give the evening to the Calendar, that is all. I do not think the amendment ought to be adopted.

Mr. BURNSIDE. The amendment does not impede the work in the least degree; it simply gives the Senate control of its own action, so that if on any day it desires to pass over a night session it can do so. It does not compel us to come here every night, but gives us the chance to say whether we ought to adjourn over a night or not. It puts it in the power of the Senate to say any day "we will not meet to-night." I hope the Senate will keep control of its action from day to day. That is my object in offering the amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island.

The amendment was agreed to; there being, on a division—ayes 26, noes 16.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. As amended will the Senate agree to the resolution?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let it be read as amended, that we may see exactly what we are doing.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That on and after Thursday, the 17th instant, unless otherwise ordered, the Senate will take a recess and meet again at half past seven p. m. of the same day, to consider the cases on the Calendar, unless upon motion the Senate shall otherwise order; and bills that are not objected to shall be taken up in their order, and each Senator shall be entitled to speak once and for five minutes only upon any question; and the objection may be interposed at any stage of the proceedings.

Mr. TELLER. I shall not be responsible, I suppose, for the language of that resolution. As it is now it is rather awkward.

Mr. McDONALD. I do not see the necessity of repeating the "not otherwise ordered."

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is necessary to make it technically safe on every point.

Mr. TELLER. Let it go.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the resolution as amended.

The resolution as amended was agreed to—ayes 40, noes not counted.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. THEODORE F. KING, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 1928) to provide for remitting the duties on the object of art awarded by the Berlin International Fishery Commission to Professor Spencer F. Baird.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 1650) for the relief of Edward T. Brownell; and

A bill (H. R. No. 6479) for the relief of Thomas Snell.

The message further announced that the House had passed a resolution to print 15,000 copies each of the second and third annual reports of the Director of the Bureau of Ethnology of the Smithsonian Institution.

EQUALITY OF TAXATION.

Mr. McDONALD. I ask the Senate to take up the resolution submitted by me yesterday for the purpose of submitting some remarks on it at this time. I ask that the resolution may be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. INGALLS in the chair.) The resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following resolution, submitted by Mr. McDONALD on the 15th instant:

Resolved, That the people ought to contribute to the support of the Government as nearly as possible in proportion to their respective abilities; that is, in proportion to the revenue they enjoy under its protection. In the observation or neglect of this maxim consists what is called the equality or inequality of taxation.

Mr. McDONALD. Mr. President, we are in the fifth year of the second century of our national independence. The tenth census has just been completed, from which it appears we have a population in States and Territories of 50,152,866. Our exports of merchandise for the current year closing on the 31st of December last amounted to $889,649,840 and our imports to $696,803,433, making the balance of trade in our favor $192,846,407. The excess of specie imports over exports for the same period was $67,375,960. Our total population by the census of 1790 was less than four million, and our exports for the month of December last far exceeded our yearly exports at the time the first census was taken.

This wonderful increase in population and advancement in material prosperity seems almost fabulous, and yet no one can say but that the next hundred years will exhibit results equally marvelous.

During the civil war, and for some years after its close, a redundant and depreciated currency had caused such an advance in price of our productions at home as to almost close the foreign markets against them, so that from 1860 to 1875 the balance of trade was constantly against us, aggregating in that period the enormous sum of $1,195,800,083; but from 1876 to the present time it has been steadily and largely in our favor.

The effect of this change has manifested itself, not only in the revival of business, but in replacing our national finances once more upon a sound metallic basis; and the present indications are that we are entering upon a period of unexampled prosperity.

In the last twenty years we have passed successfully through the ordeal of a civil war, the most gigantic that any nation ever experienced, which was followed by the worst financial panic known to our history; and yet it would be difficult for a stranger to trace in our present condition the marks of the one or the effects of the other.

In the future we may be visited by financial panics; overtrading and speculation may bring bankruptcy upon us, but it is not probable that we will again be afflicted with civil war. It may require time to heal the wounds caused by the last war, but the theories which made such a war possible, and the causes that ultimately led to it, alike passed away with its close, and it is not probable that any considerable party in any State will assert again the doctrine of secession as a constitutional right, and in no section of our country will this doctrine find less support than in the States lately in rebellion, for in the maintenance of the Union under the Constitution will the people of those States find the best guarantees for domestic tranquillity, and in the aid which they will derive from the supporting arm of the Federal Government their most efficient material advancement. I would sooner far expect to see New England revive the doctrine of the Hartford convention than that the South should again assert the right of secession. It was not a native of the South, and nothing but the peculiar circumstances surrounding that people at the time could have given it growth or strength in that section. It was a fallacy that presupposed that the framers of our Federal Constitution while providing for a government had also provided for its dissolution.

In the future we may expect that new questions will arise and that old issues will be revived. The rapid growth of our country and its vast business, embracing its internal as well as its external commerce, must necessarily impose upon the Federal Government important responsibilities that may call for the exercise of latent powers. The aggregation of wealth in the great corporations of the country at present organized and existing under the laws of the several States will undoubtedly call for the exercise of such powers as may be vested in the Federal Government in connection with the regulation of commerce among States, to aid the States in exercising authority and power over such corporations to keep them within proper bounds, and to prevent them from oppressing the people by unjust exactions.

The right of secession may never again be asserted, but the right of the States will still remain, and should be clearly ascertained and guarded. The preservation of the powers of the Federal Government in all their vigor has been fully assured by the results of the civil war, and those powers are not likely to be diminished. It is now of the first importance that the rights reserved to the States and to the people should remain unimpaired. The leading purposes of the Federal Government are to maintain our relations with foreign nations, and to extend our trade and commerce, and to secure domestic tranquillity. The powers granted to secure these ends ought not to be exercised so as to encroach upon the rights of the States over the subject of home rule, so necessary to their peace and prosperity. In the future the preservation of these rights must in a great degree depend upon the representatives of the people who may be connected with the national administration.

But, Mr. President, it is not my purpose on this occasion to engage in any extended discussion of these grave and important questions, even if I felt myself possessed of the ability to do so. I know of but one safe rule by which they are to be determined, and that is to abstain from the exercise of all doubtful powers and adhere to a strict construction of the Constitution. Even then questions will arise in the application of this rule that it will be very difficult to solve.

I desire more particularly to present some views in reference to the proper execution of conceded powers, rather than discuss the questions arising on the boundaries of Federal and State authorities. The power "to lay and collect taxes, imposts, and excises" is one among the express grants of power to the United States, and without it the Government created by the Constitution could not exist. But duties, imposts, and excises are to be uniform throughout the United States. In order to guard this power against abuse the Constitution vests in the popular branch of the legislative department of the Government the sole power of originating "bills for raising revenue," in the belief that the immediate representatives of the people would not exact more than would be required by a strict and economical administration of the Government. To guard still further against excessive taxation it is provided that no capitation or other direct tax should be levied, except in proportion to the census or enumeration provided for in the Constitution, and that no tax or duty should be "laid on any article exported from any State."

It has not often been found necessary to resort to the power of direct taxation, but the revenues of the Government have usually been raised by indirect taxes, chief of which are tariff duties collected on foreign imports. The power to impose such duties has always been regarded as an important branch of the taxing power, and the revenue derived from that source has ordinarily been sufficient to meet the expenses of the Federal Government.

A tariff is a tax upon the people who consume the imports upon which it is imposed, and when fairly and justly levied it has always been a favored mode of raising revenue. There is no actual compulsory payment, and the sums paid go into the current expenses of the parties paying them, and the burden does not appear so great as when the payment is direct and at some stated period.

The power to tax is the power to take from the citizens a portion of their income or property, to be applied to the expenses of the Government, and the amount that each citizen should contribute to the support of the Government should be as nearly as possible in proportion to his abilities and the degree of protection afforded him by the State. These fundamental principles or maxims were clearly laid down by Adam Smith more than one hundred years ago, and have never been disputed, although they are often disregarded in actual legislation. They are flagrantly violated in every tariff law that has as a controlling element in it the doctrine of protection. No party in this country has ever contended that a tariff should be levied purely for protection. On the other hand, no party has claimed that we were in a condition to adopt the policy of unconditional free trade, but that the Federal revenue or the major part of it ought to be collected from customs duties. Those who favor, however, the doctrine of protection seek to establish it as an incidental or secondary right.

Free trade between nations, as between individuals, is undeniably the foundation upon which commerce should rest, and the Government that can most nearly approach this policy, consistent with a proper administration of its own affairs, will in the end bestow the greatest benefit upon its people.

The practical wisdom of free trade is illustrated in our interstate commerce, and was well understood by the men who framed our Federal Constitution. "No tax or duty shall be levied on articles exported from any State," is the language of that instrument, while free and unrestricted commerce among the several States is secured by language equally strong and emphatic, so that no State of its own volition can place any restrictions whatever upon it.

In the rapid development of our country and in its varied resources it is easy to see that but for these wise provisions of the Federal Constitution the unwise and selfish policy of protection might have encumbered us at every step. There is no part of our country that has not some advantage over other parts in the matter of production. In manufactures the East has heretofore led all other sections, by reason of its capital and its facilities to market its productions, while the West and South, by reason of the fertility of the soil, has possessed great advantages over the Eastern and Middle States as to agriculture. The mining centers are constantly changing. Pennsylvania and New Jersey, which for a time held the monopoly of the manufacture of iron, have been hard pressed by Ohio, and will soon have to yield to Tennessee, Alabama, and Missouri. It is now a demonstrated fact that Chattanooga and Birmingham can manufacture pig-iron $5 per ton cheaper than Youngstown or Johnstown, while the Eastern and Middle States have long since ceased to compete with the great West in breadstuffs and provisions. And yet how much more prosperous all are than if a narrow policy had prevailed of attempting to protect one locality against another.

A tariff for revenue necessarily affords incidental protection, but when it is levied with a view to protect and not to secure revenue, then it becomes a bounty to the extent of the protection afforded paid by the consumer to the person producing the article protected; and as there are always more consumers than producers of any given article, it is a burden imposed upon the many for the benefit of the few. The moneys thus paid are not taxes that go into the Treasury for the support of the Government, but into the pockets of the producer or manufacturer, and thus add to their profits. Take our last fiscal year as an illustration. The revenue collected upon $419,506,090 of foreign merchandise amounted to $182,747,653, being an average duty, computed at ad valorem rates, of 43½ per cent.; that is, our people purchased for consumption foreign merchandise enhanced in price by the addition of the duty levied upon it to the amount above stated. So far they were simply paying the tax into the Treasury; but this forms but a fraction of the whole amount of the goods consumed in this country. A much larger quantity of domestic manufactured articles made up the balance, and upon these the consumers paid the enhanced price, caused by the protection afforded by the tariff, so that for every dollar paid by the consumer into the Treasury he was required to pay at least three, and by some estimates five, to the manufacturer or producer of the domestic articles consumed.

It may be true that in some exceptional cases, and for a limited period, it would be beneficial to give protection; but the evils of a general policy of protection have been so strikingly exemplified in our past history that, if there was no question of the power of Congress to pass protective legislation, as a policy it ought to be abandoned. Class legislation of this kind always increases its demands, and, under one specious pretext or another, is apt to secure the continuance of the system and the increase of the burden upon the consumer.

Our present tariff laws are full of exemplifications of this fact when compared with past legislation on that subject and the statistics which our foreign trade furnishes us. Take, for example, the imports and exports of cotton goods. The average tariff rate ad valorem on cotton goods is above 39 per cent., and the duty derived from imports for the last fiscal year on this class of goods amounted to less than $10,000,000; while our exports of the same class of goods equaled the revenue derived from the imports, so that the cotton manufacturers of this country not only supplied the greater part of the home demand at enhanced prices, but shipped to foreign markets their surplus productions, to be sold at reduced prices in competition with the foreign manufacturer. And this is true of nearly all classes of manufactured articles, as will be seen by examining a list of our exports. So that while our own people are paying the enhanced prices both upon foreign and domestic goods, caused by the protective tariff now in force, other countries are receiving the benefit of our surplus at reduced rates.

The tariff act of the first session of the First Congress, passed with a whereas declaring it to be "necessary for the support of the Government, for the discharge of the debt of the United States, and the encouragement and protection of manufacturers, that duties be levied on goods, wares, and merchandise imported," did not exceed 15 per cent. ad valorem; and now at the end of a century we find ourselves burdened with a tariff of nearly three times that rate. This great increase of the rate of tariff duties has been accompanied by some unjust discrimination against western interests. This is notably the case in regard to salt.

This article of prime necessity ought not to bear any unnecessary burdens, and yet all imported salt pays a duty equal to about 50 per cent. ad valorem, which amounts to prohibition, except as to so much as our people are compelled to use in curing provisions for shipment to foreign countries. The revenue derived from its importation for the last fiscal year was $845,293.

The first tariff provided for a drawback equal to the duty paid on all salt used in curing fish and provisions, which of course included salt used in curing meats and in packing pork and beef for market.

This policy of favoring fish and provisions was continued for many years, but in 1866 the drawback extended only to salt used in curing fish; and this discrimination has been carried forward into the Revised Statutes, as will be seen by section 3022, and is now in force. So that from the beginning salt has been virtually duty free to those who have been engaged in the fisheries, while at least for the last sixteen years it has been heavily taxed to those who are compelled to use it in packing beef and pork for foreign markets. As the tariff thus paid enters into the cost of provisions upon which the salt is used, this class of our exports is made to pay a duty to that extent, in violation of the Constitution, which provides that no tax or duty shall be laid upon any article exported from any State. Again, woolen fabrics, without any special discrimination as to fineness or quality, pay a duty, rated ad valorem, of 59 per cent., while ready-made clothing of the same material pay a duty of 50 per cent.; so that a suit of clothes such as laboring-men are compelled to purchase under the operations of the tariff costs from $12 to $18, which would otherwise cost from $8 to $12, causing a great inequality of taxation by making its principal burdens fall upon that class least able to bear them. But it may be in general stated that a tariff the purpose of which is protection fosters one branch of industry to the detriment of others, and must in the nature of things operate unequally by creating a favorite class where none should exist. All this is avoided by treating the powers of Congress over the subject as the Constitution evidently designed they should be, as conferred for the purpose of revenue. In the formal work of legislation this has always been done. No tariff bill has ever originated in this body. As between the two Houses of Congress, it has always been conceded that such a bill was a "bill for raising revenue." It has even sometimes been questioned how far such bills could be amended in the Senate, and it has on more than one occasion been contended that such amendments could go no further than to increase or diminish the rate of taxation prescribed by the House bill, and could not embrace for taxation new subjects not included in it.

The democratic party also has always taken this view of the powers of the Federal Government, and has opposed the so-called protection policy as unconstitutional as well as unwise, and especially in its platform of 1876 "demanded that all custom-house taxation should be only for revenue." The reassertion of this principle in the platform of 1880 it is true has been denounced in this Chamber as a "remarkable blunder," and it has been charged here and elsewhere that the assertion of it had caused the defeat of the democratic party in the last presidential election.

I deny most decidedly the truth of this charge, and if in the late political contest the republican party derived any advantage from the tariff issue, it was not by controverting the doctrine laid down on that subject by the democratic platform, but by falsely charging that the democratic party contemplated the repeal of all tariff laws and the establishment of unconditional free trade, well knowing at the time that our governmental necessities could not permit the adoption of such a policy. Our total ordinary expenses for the last fiscal year amounted to $267,642,957.78; for the present year the amount will be about the same. About ninety-six million dollars of this is for interest on our public debt, which may from this time forth decrease until it finally disappears by the full payment of that debt, which I hope will be accomplished at no distant period. Even then, without counting upon any great increase in our ordinary expenses, it will be necessary for us to raise over $200,000,000 annually, so that our governmental expenses require all the revenue that we can properly raise by customs duties, strictly confined to that purpose; there is no probability that the power to lay and collect duties and imposts will be discontinued so long as our Government continues to exist, or that the incidental protection will not be all that ought in justice to the great mass of our people be imposed. Even England in her greatest approach to free trade has deemed it wise and prudent to raise a large portion of her revenue from customs duties. But there was another element that mingled in this contest, and other forces that came to the support of the republican party to aid it in making political capital out of its false charge.

The men of New England and elsewhere who were enjoying the benefits of a protective tariff, fearing that their profits might be affected by its modification, administered to their employés what they called "persuasive advice," by threatening to close their factories and discontinue their business if the democratic party should prevail, and to aid this kind of peaceable coercion handbills and pamphlets were circulated predicting general bankruptcy and ruin if the assumed free-trade policy of the democratic party should prevail. These things so disreputable to the republican party and their aiders and abettors may have had some influence in controlling the votes of men who felt themselves in the power and at the mercy of their employers, and if the republican party can now boast of having succeeded by such means, it can furnish no argument against the soundness of the position taken by the democratic party. On the contrary, it reveals a danger to our free institutions that no right-minded man can contemplate without alarm, as it tends to destroy all freedom of the ballot; for the man who does not vote his own will but the will of another is no longer a free elector, and he who coerces him to cast his ballot under such circumstances is a tyrant.

No, Mr. President, the democratic party was not defeated because it advocated a constitutional tariff and opposed the doctrine of protection, and I trust on this subject it will "take no step backward." Let its motto be, "equal and exact justice to all men, exclusive privileges to none," and with an abiding faith in the honesty and intelligence of the people its final triumph is certain.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana desire action on the resolution?

Mr. McDONALD. No, the resolution may lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will lie on the table, subject to the call of the Senator from Indiana.

SOLDIERS' REUNION IN MAINE.

Mr. HAMLIN. The Senate has on two or three occasions passed joint resolutions allowing equipments, tents, and flags for the use of soldiers' reunions. I have copied the one relating to Nebraska, which passed this body the other day, and I submit a joint resolution and ask the Senate to allow it to be considered at this time. It is an exact copy of the one in regard to Nebraska.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 162) to grant the use of artillery, tents, &c., to be used at the soldiers' reunion to be held in Maine in 1881; and it was read three times, and passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. McPHERSON. I desire to call up for consideration the bill (S. No. 1050) for the relief of Thomas G. Corbin.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. COCKRELL. I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The regular order is demanded, and the Secretary will report the first bill on the Calendar of General Orders at the point last reached when the Calendar was under consideration by the Senate.

Mr. McPHERSON. I shall ask the Senate to take up this bill. I move to lay aside the Calendar of General Orders for the purpose of taking up Senate bill No. 1050.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New Jersey that the pending order be laid aside.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 18, noes 7; no quorum voting.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope when there is a quorum the Calendar will not be laid aside. Half a dozen Senators have been protesting to have the Calendar taken up, and they are not here to vote to proceed with it. If we are to transact any business at all, we must stick to the Calendar.

Mr. EATON and others. Let the Senate be called.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll of the Senate.

The Secretary called the roll, and forty-six Senators answered to their names.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A quorum is present, and the question is on the motion of the Senator from New Jersey to postpone the Calendar of General Orders for the purpose of considering the bill named by him.

Mr. COCKRELL. Before that motion is put I wish to say that the point reached when the Calendar was last under consideration is order of business No. 573. The Senator from New Jersey now proposes to skip all the cases and go to Calendar order of business No. 853, which is a bill for the relief of Thomas G. Corbin, reported from the Committee on Military Affairs. There are many cases on the Calendar which have been reported from that committee prior to that bill, which was reported January 12, 1881. It is gross injustice to all the cases preceding it that that bill should be given precedence. I hope the motion will be voted down.

Mr. McPHERSON. I desire to state in answer to the Senator from Missouri that it is true there are many bills on the Calendar which are House bills considered by the Committee on Military Affairs and reported favorably. This is a Senate bill, and in order that the House may have time to take action upon it (it will require a very short time to pass it; I suppose nobody will object to it) I ask that the bill may be considered so that it may be sent to the House in time for action there. I hope the Senate will take up the bill.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I dislike to oppose the motion of my colleague, but the Committee on Military Affairs has presented to this body over sixty reports, not one of which has yet been acted upon. Some of these reports were presented as long ago as last April. The Calendar has not been touched in twenty-seven days, and I ask now that when we can get to the Calendar at all, it shall be taken up regularly, giving every case its proper chance.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to say to the Senator from New Jersey that I have been watching for several days to get up a little bill that is very important, reported from the Committee on Military Affairs. I have had the Calendar before me, thinking we should reach it very soon. We are within three or four cases of it now on the Calendar, and I certainly dislike very much to jump over two hundred cases in order to take up a bill that is not near so important in my judgment. I shall object to the proposition of the Senator from New Jersey for that reason. I want to go on regularly with the Calendar.

Mr. McPHERSON. I desire simply to say that for the past six days I have stood here in my place trying to get the eye of the presiding officer that I might move to take up this bill, but I have been superseded by other bills that other Senators desired to have considered. If it is the intent of the Senate not to consider this bill, I wish to give notice that I shall antagonize every bill which is not in its regular place on the Calendar and reached in its regular order.

Mr. COCKRELL. I trust that the motion will be voted down, in order that the Senator from New Jersey may be brought up to that standard of discharging his duty on this floor. It will be a great blessing if he will do it. I ask for the regular order.

Mr. BURNSIDE. What is the motion?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is to suspend the pending order, which is the consideration of the Calendar under the Anthony rule, which motion the Senator from New Jersey makes, as he states, for the purpose of calling up another bill on the Calendar.

Mr. BURNSIDE. May we know what the bill is?

Mr. COCKRELL. It is order of business No. 853, and we are now at order No. 573.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I should like to hear the bill reported.

The Chief Clerk read the bill for the relief of Thomas G. Corbin.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. McPHERSON.]

The motion was not agreed to.

DETAILS OF OFFICERS AS PROFESSORS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the first business on the Calendar.

The joint resolution (S. R. No. 70) to increase the number of officers of the Army allowed to be detailed as professors of military science at colleges and universities was announced as being first in order on the Calendar; and its consideration was resumed as in Committee of the Whole.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This joint resolution has been previously under consideration, and the pending question is on an amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL,] which will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. The proposed amendment is to strike out the third section of the substitute reported from the Committee on Military Affairs in the following words:

All acts or parts of acts authorizing or permitting the detail of officers of the Army on the active list to act as president, superintendent, or professor of any college or university or other institutions of learning, and all acts inconsistent with any of the provisions of this act, are hereby repealed.

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not know whether we ought to consider this case in the absence of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] who is very much interested in it. If any other Senator desires to take charge of it, it may be well enough to consider it, but if not it had better be passed over informally.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri object to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. LOGAN. Let us go on with it.

Mr. COCKRELL. All right.

Mr. LOGAN. The section which it is proposed to strike out, as I understand, repeals the law that allows officers on the active list to serve as professors in the colleges, and I hope the amendment will be adopted.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is now on agreeing to the amendment reported from the committee, which has been amended on the motion of the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL.]

Mr. LOGAN. Let the amendment as amended be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs is to strike out all after the resolving clause and to insert—

That for the purpose of promoting knowledge of military science among the young men of the United States the President may, upon the applicaton of any college, university, or other institution of learning incorporated under the laws of any State within the United States, having capacity to educate at the same time not less than one hundred and fifty male students, detail an officer of the Army on the retired list to act as president, superintendent, or professor thereof: Provided, however, Such college, university, or other institution of learning incorporated as aforesaid, to which such officer shall be so detailed, shall pay to him monthly during the time he is so detailed and serves as such president, superintendent, or professor thereof, a sum of money equal to the difference between the retired monthly pay of such officer and the monthly pay he would receive if upon the active list of the Army in the grade upon which he is retired: Provided, also, That officers of the Army so detailed shall be governed by general rules prescribed from time to time by the President of the United States.

SEC. 2. The Secretary of War is authorized to issue, at his discretion, and under proper regulations to be prescribed by him, out of any small-arms or pieces of field-artillery belonging to the Government, and which can be spared for that purpose, such number of the same as may appear to be required for military instruction and practice by the students of any college, university, or other institution of learning aforesaid, to which any officer of the Army may be detailed under this act, for which the officer so detailed shall receipt and account in the manner prescribed by Army regulations when like property is issued for proper purposes. And the Secretary of War shall also require from the proper authorities of such institution in each case a bond in double the value of the property for the care and safe-keeping thereof, and for the return of the same when required.

Mr. McMILLAN. I move to amend the amendment in line 9 of section 2 by striking out the words "under this act" after "detailed;" so as to read "to which any officer of the Army may be detailed."

Mr. MORRILL. That is right.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A joint resolution to provide for the detail of retired officers of the Army to colleges, universities, and other incorporated institutions of learning."

JABEZ BURCHARD.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 543) for the relief of Jabez Burchard.

Mr. McPHERSON. I suggest that the bill be passed over without prejudice until the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] shall be present. He has especial charge of it, and I should like to have it the understanding that he may call it up at any time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over, retaining its place on the Calendar, if there is no objection.

ANGUS M'AULEY.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 1432) granting a pension to Angus McAuley, the consideration of which was resumed as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with amendments: In line 4, before the words "the pension-roll," to strike out "place on" and insert "restore to;" in line 7, before "war," to insert "Creek Indian," and after the word "war" to strike out "of 1812, and pay him his pension from the time when he was dropped from the rolls," and insert "and pay him a pension from and after the passage of this act;" so as to make the bill read:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to restore to the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Angus McAuley, of Suwannee County, Florida, a soldier of the Creek Indian war, and pay him a pension from and after the passage of this act.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SOLDIERS' HOMESTEAD LOCATIONS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 858) for the relief of certain settlers on the public lands, and to provide for the repayment of certain fees and commissions paid on void entries of public lands; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like for the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] to let me know about how much this will involve, and how it comes that these are innocent parties to fraudulent claims?

Mr. PLUMB. I will state for the information of the Senator from Missouri and of the Senate that a great many cases have arisen where parties have been permitted to make entries within railroad limits, and the decision of the Department has subsequently been that the entries were void on account of conflict with the railroad grant. There are perhaps a thousand cases of that kind in the State of Kansas.

Mr. COCKRELL. Is that held to be a fraudulent and a void entry?

Mr. PLUMB. No; that is not a fraudulent entry.

Mr. COCKRELL. The relief seems to be confined to those entries which are fraudulent and void.

Mr. PLUMB. They were void, but not necessarily fraudulent.

Mr. COCKRELL. The point I want to know is, how innocent parties are connected with the fraudulent claims.

Mr. PLUMB. I have not a copy of the bill before me; but if the Senator will send me his copy of it, I can explain to him the two classes of cases which are covered by the measure. The bill which the Senator has called on me to explain was introduced by the Senator from California, [Mr. BOOTH.] The fraudulent and void entries referred to in the first section have reference exclusively to a class of cases where entries are made by what are called soldiers' floating homesteads. Some parties in the State which the Senator from Missouri so admirably represents in part got up fraudulent soldier-homestead rights and sold them to innocent parties, who afterward located them. The fraud inhered not in the location, but in the soldier's homestead which was so located, and those entries were afterward set aside because of the fraudulent character of the homestead right which had been located upon the land. The reference to fraudulent and void cases in the first section is to locations of that kind. The second section provides that in all cases where homestead or timber-culture entries or other entries of public lands, not fraudulent or void entries at all, but entries of the kind of which I spoke which have been made within railroad limits, and sometimes perhaps in other cases, but most particularly in that class of cases, the receiver of public moneys of the Land Office shall repay to the person who made such entry the fees and commissions and excesses paid upon the same upon the surrender of the duplicate receipt and the execution of a proper relinquishment of all claims to such lands.

Mr. SAULSBURY. If the Senator will allow me, I understand him to say that parties went into the market and bought fraudulent and bogus claims for rights of settlement to public lands with which the Government had nothing to do, and now it is proposed to repay them the expenses of the fees which they paid the Government upon those fraudulent claims. Is that true?

Mr. PLUMB. I can make this measure, I think, very plain in a moment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of half-past one having arrived——

Mr. PLUMB. I should be glad to have this matter disposed of, so far as this explanation goes at all events, so that it may not be misunderstood.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. PLUMB. It will take me but a moment. The law provided for the location of certain soldiers' homesteads who had taken already eighty acres of land in railroad limits of an additional eighty acres of land, under the decision of the Land Office. They were what is called "floating locations;" that is to say, locations that might be located anywhere on public land. Certain persons personated these soldiers; that is to say, they got up papers which purported to be in behalf of certain persons who had before located public land and sold them to innocent purchasers, who proceeded to locate them. Subsequently it was ascertained that these locations were fraudulent and that the Department had not exercised proper scrutiny in regard to the locations. This bill is to provide for the repayment of the fees which these innocent persons who had purchased these rights had paid to the Government in the location of these lands. That is the subject to which the first section of the bill refers.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The unfinished business now comes up; but prior to that the Chair will take occasion to present for reference the bills on his table from the House of Representatives.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 1650) for the relief of Edward T. Brownell was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The bill (H. R. No. 6479) for the relief of Thomas Snell was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

REPORT OF BUREAU OF ETHNOLOGY.

The following concurrent resolution, this day received from the House of Representatives, was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That there be printed at the Government Printing Office 15,000 copies each of the second and third annual reports of the Director of the Bureau of Ethnology of the Smithsonian Institution, with the necessary illustrations; 7,272 copies of which shall be for the use of the House of Representatives, 3,000 copies for the use of the Senate, and 4,728 for distribution by the Bureau of Ethnology.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE POTOMAC.

Mr. WITHERS. I ask leave now to submit the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments to House bill No. 1381, and ask its present consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, in the chair.) The Senator from Virginia presents the report of a committee of conference, which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 1381) to authorize the construction of a free bridge across the Potomac River at or near Georgetown, in the District of Columbia, having met, after a full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House of Representatives recede from its disagreement to Senate amendment No. 1, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to Senate amendment No. 2, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: Strike out all the words in section 2, and, in lieu thereof, insert the following:

"SEC. 2. That for the purpose of establishing a free bridge, and in lieu of erecting the bridge provided for in the preceding section, the Secretary of War may, in his discretion, purchase the aqueduct bridge now crossing the Potomac River at Georgetown: Provided, Said bridge, with all the appurtenances, rights, and franchises connected therewith, including piers and real estate for abutments and approaches, can be purchased for a sum not exceeding $85,000, which sum, or so much thereof as may be necessary, may be paid out of the money appropriated by this act: Provided further, That a good and sufficient title thereto can be secured to the United States to be approved by the Attorney-General of the United States: It is further provided, That the Alexandria Canal Company or its present lessees shall have the right to maintain, at their own cost and expense, a canal aqueduct of the same width and depth as the one now in use, and to attach it to or suspend it from said bridge; and whenever a permanent bridge shall be erected upon said site, the same shall be of sufficient strength to sustain the weight of such canal aqueduct; but the construction, attachment, and maintenance of such aqueduct shall be such as the Secretary of War may determine, and shall be without cost or liability to the United States or the District of Columbia: And it is further provided, That if upon the erection of such permanent bridge the said canal company or their present lessees shall neglect or refuse to reconstruct, secure, and attach the said aqueduct at their own expense, or if at any time for the space of six months they shall fail to use such aqueduct for the purposes of a canal, or fail to keep the same in good condition and repair, or if at any time they shall use the same for other than canal purposes, then all rights of said canal company, its lessees or assigns, in said bridge and property shall cease and determine, and the said aqueduct shall be detached and removed by the Secretary of War."

And that the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to Senate amendment No. 3, and agree to the same, with an amendment, as follows: In line 2 of section 3, after the word "authorized," insert the words "in his discretion;" and that the Senate agree to the same.

R. E. WITHERS,
E. H. ROLLINS,
S. J. R. McMILLAN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
NELSON W. ALDRICH,
EPPA HUNTON,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. INGALLS. I should like to see that in print.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection being made to the present consideration of the report, it will lie over and be printed.

JOHN JONES.

Mr. McMILLAN. I ask unanimous consent to present a letter from the Secretary of War addressed to me, inclosing a report from the Adjutant-General on the military records of Mr. John Jones, late ordnance-sergeant, United States Army, together with a report of the engagement with the Sioux Indians in August, 1862, made by Commanding Officer T. J. Sheehan, at Fort Ridgley, Minnesota, and ask that the letter with the accompanying papers be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs in connection with the petition of John Jones now before the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The papers will be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. MORGAN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 7104) making appropriations for the construction, completion, repair, and preservation of certain works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. No. 858) for the relief of certain settlers on the public lands, and to provide for the repayment of certain fees and commissions paid on void entries of public lands; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Mr. McMILLAN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 7036) to establish post-routes; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ROLLINS submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 7035) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

THE FUNDING BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 4592) to facilitate the refunding of the national debt, the pending question being on the amendment reported by the Committee on Finance, in section 1, line 18, after the word "three" to insert "and one-half;" so as to read:

The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to issue bonds to an amount not exceeding $400,000,000, of denominations of $50, or some multiple of that sum, which shall bear interest at the rate of 3½ per cent. per annum.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President——

Mr. KIRKWOOD. If the Senator will allow me a moment, I wish to submit a modification of the amendment offered by me yesterday, and I ask that it be printed.

The proposed amendment was ordered to be printed, and is as follows:

It shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, to authorize public subscriptions at not less than par to be received at all depositories of the United States, and at all national banks, for the bonds and for the Treasury notes herein provided for, for thirty days before he shall contract for or award any portion of said bonds or Treasury notes to any syndicate of individuals or bankers, or otherwise than under such public subscriptions; and if it shall happen that more than the entire amount of said bonds and Treasury notes, or of either of them, has been subscribed within said thirty days, he shall award the full amount subscribed to all persons who shall have made bona fide subscriptions for the sum of —— thousand dollars or less, at rates most advantageous to the United States, and the residue ratably among the subscribers in proportion to the amount by them respectively subscribed, at rates most advantageous to the United States.

Mr. WITHERS. Before the Senator from Vermont proceeds to the discussion of the question before the Senate, I desire to call attention to the fact that there are two appropriation bills now on our Calendar, one of which has been placed in my charge. While I recognize the importance of the bill now under consideration, and am not willing to displace it, provided there is a prospect of its being disposed of in a reasonable time, I merely ask the attention of the Senate to the fact, and also announce that should the discussion be protracted unreasonably, I shall feel it my duty to test the sense of the Senate as to the relative importance of the funding bill and an appropriation bill.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, the very able speech of the chairman of the Committee on Finance yesterday leaves little room for anything more to be said in advocacy of the present measure. I shall therefore occupy but little time of the Senate.

The changes proposed to the funding bill by the Committee on Finance are few, and only such as are likely to bring the measure into practical accord with its title and make it a success. Anything less than this, wholly or only in part a failure, it is clear had better not find any place in our public statutes.

The unbounded prosperity which has been flowing over and fertilizing our country for a year or two past naturally inspires us with sanguine hopes for the future, but should not blind us to the fact that the work we have yet to accomplish in obtaining voluntary subscribers to a loan of not less than $671,000,000 at a heavy reduction in the rate of interest is, as Mr. Lincoln would have said, "a big job." This is to be a popular loan, obtained, as we hope, from the pockets of our own people. In order that such a measure shall from the outset be operative, with no foot out of joint, there should not be anything on the face of the act that shall breed any distrust in the minds of those who are to trust the Government, many of them, perhaps, with the chief part of all the fortunes they possess. It must not, therefore, be a forced or compulsory loan. If there were any persons or institutions so much within our power that we could say to them, this or worse, and thus obtain a part of what we need, instead of being an inducement to other persons or institutions not so situated to come to our help for the remainder wanted, it would only excite some pity for the sufferers and more for the Government reduced to such questionable expedients.

A resumption of specie payments has added largely to the volume of currency. A fruitful season has furnished the unprecedented crops that have brought millions of foreign gold into the hands of the cultivators of the soil, and our supply of home manufactures has so far given to us the power to keep the gold instead of surrendering it for the products of foreign machinery and of foreign labor. Money, until very recently, has been a drug in the market. New enterprises were long looked upon with suspicion; few were willing to risk capital anywhere; any loss of interest was not to be computed so long as the principal was safe. But all this seems to have suddenly changed. Lands and houses now are wanted; machinery is sought after; laborers everywhere find employment; there are no tramps; more railroads are projected and under way than ever before. The loans of banks and bankers have again reached their maximum point, and the price of loanable funds has everywhere advanced. This is the striking feature of the money market, not only here, but in France, in Germany, in England, and in all the great centers of capital throughout the world. Such a rise in the value of money is indicative of prosperity as much as it is otherwise when business is so stagnant that solvent men do not appear as borrowers even at the lowest rates. There is a new impetus felt among business men and enterprises requiring immense moneyed contributions are promptly undertaken. Capital, after a long season of idleness, is once more trying hard to earn something for its owners, and its absorption and activity are the leading features of the day. It is much sought after, and the bottom dollar may be found sooner than is expected.

But this may quickly change. Our foreign trade has already largely increased. Whenever our imports begin to exceed the exports the tide will be against us, and as specie is called for to settle the balance of trade the money market always tightens. Good crops abroad would be sure to shut out any large foreign demand for our surplus agricultural productions, and a short crop of these at home could not fail to produce some stringency in the cash accounts of the country. It is fair weather to-day, but it may not last forever. As prudent men we must so trim our sails as to withstand the storm whenever it comes.

It would be a mistake not to pass a funding act at this session, and it would be a greater mistake not to give the Secretary of the Treasuary an act that would be assured of success.

There are some persons who think a 3 per cent. bond might now be negotiated, but nearly all persons couple this idea with a longer term of time for the bonds to run. But any one who will compute the matter arithmetically will see that this would be the most costly and expensive provision that could be provided. Interest for a long term of years vastly exceeds any fraction for a short term of time. Undoubtedly there is a large outside influence brought to favor a 3 per cent. funding act on the part of those who have large sums invested in our four and four-and-a-half percents, which by their rise would put into the pockets of large holders some millions of dollars, whether the loan at 3 per cent. should be taken or not. There are others who are interested in floating 6 per cent. railroad bonds and other bonds of a miscellaneous and speckled character, and these persons desire to have the Government attempt to make a loan that will drag heavily and by comparison yield less interest nominally by one-half than the bonds which they represent.

There are still other parties, as so well said yesterday by the Senator from Kentucky, who now hold the 5 and 6 per cent. bonds of the Government, and they would like to hold them a good deal longer. They know that these bonds cannot be taken out of their hands and the interest will not stop until the Secretary of the Treasury has the cash in hand to pay for them. If not paid the difference of interest will be a loss to the Government of $12,000,000, or enough to cover a half of 1 per cent. in the whole loan for some time.

Of course all these parties make up a powerful combination in favor of a 3 per cent. funding act, and when passed their favor might be expected to cease.

To restrict a loan to the rate of 3 per cent. would necessarily confine its acceptance to the few places where at times there are funds seeking employment upon any terms, and there would be no market for bonds or Treasury notes to be found in the greater portion of our States where business is remunerative and where higher rates of interest prevail. To a great extent I should be glad to have these bonds distributed among all of the States. I hope that not a dollar will go abroad, thoroughly believing that it would be easier and better for the people of this country to support a public debt bearing 4 per cent. interest, paid to and expended at home by our own people, than a debt at 3 per cent. paid abroad and annually draining the country of a large sum to which we bid adieu forever.

If we were about to put even $100,000,000 more of 4 per cent. bonds upon the market instead of $671,000,000, there is no doubt it would depress the market price. The 4 per cent. bonds deposited for the security of national bank circulation, which are from week to week withdrawn in excess of the amount deposited, throws upon the market that amount of additional bonds, and, small as is this amount, it is very noticeable that it fully feeds the demand, and the market price is barely sustained. The public are not hungry for more. In the month of January, 1881, and twelve days of the month of February, $5,545,300 of the 4 per cent. bonds were withdrawn and $1,815,000 deposited. Thus in six weeks the excess of these bonds withdrawn from the Treasury and thrown upon the market was $3,729,500. The excess of 4½ per cent. bonds withdrawn during the same time was $1,467,900. If these small sums are all the market will now sustain, the effect of $671,000,000 of bonds at once thrown upon the market can be easily foreseen.

I know that on its face it would be popular to assert the power of the Government to obtain a loan at one-half of 1 per cent. less interest, and it might be still more popular to assert the power of the Government to obtain it at 1 per cent. less interest. That would double the popularity, but it would not dispose of a single bond. This is all mere matter of opinion, and the financial condition, present and future, of our country is to be taken into the account; and it is, I fear, a vainglorious assumption to start out with the idea that Americans have so much money that they do not know what to do with it, and that they will let the Government gobble it up upon its own terms without any reference as to what may be its marketable value for years to come.

It is a mistake to suppose that a 3 per cent. bond will yield as much interest as the 4 per cent., bought at the present price of 13 per cent. premium. The latter when issued had thirty years to run, and will yield more than 3 per cent. until the premium rises above 18 per cent. But even a fresh block of these long bonds suddenly put upon the market would cause them to sink in price.

Another great fact deserves notice. We all know that call loans are made in all money markets at the lowest rates. In the month of January last the call rates in Boston were from 4 to 7 per cent.; in Philadelphia, from 3 to 6 per cent.; in Cincinnati, from 4 to 5 per cent.; and in Saint Louis, from 6 to 8 per cent. It thus appears that money is nowhere going a-begging.

There is one skeleton in the closet of the United States Treasury, and however alarming its future aspect may be, the fact of its existence there remains indisputable. I hardly need to explain that I refer to the not less than $78,000,000 of silver in the Treasury, and which the people stubbornly refuse to touch or handle. It is a huge elephant on our hands, which we can neither chain nor let go free. I have seen with pleasure that there is a convention soon to assemble under the favor of France, Germany, and the United States, to consider what is best to be done with the silver question. That it is a question of the gravest difficulty, reaching round the world, will not be disputed. I regret that diplomacy has not urged the consideration of this subject at a much earlier day, but I confess with some doubt as to any acceptable result. It is, however, the only present promise of a remedy for the disjointed relations universally prevailing of gold and silver coinage. If the measure which shall finally be agreed upon by the proposed convention should be 15½ of silver for 1 of gold, instead of the present ratio of 16 to 1, while its intrinsic value or market relation stands at 18 to 1, it will be likely to plunge us into deeper and wider embarrassments than those which now seem to vex us.

I refer to this only to show that our bonds and credit have got to stand the shock threatened in the solution of this problem, and one graver has not perplexed statesmen during the present century. If the coinage of silver is to be maintained, it is obvious that any turn of foreign exchanges against the country would cause our stock of gold to run away from us more swiftly than it recently came to us. This would suddenly and violently reduce the value of all our public securities at least 12 per cent. or more. I cannot believe that it will be the policy of any one to have our securities, now or at any future time, unable to float at par in the general markets of our country. That is a degradation from which it is to be hoped we may escape.

I favored the half of 1 per cent. for expenses of engraving, printing, and negotiating the bonds instead of one-fourth of 1 per cent., because the experience of the Treasury Department in funding a very large sum at less cost than was ever before done by any government in the world proves conclusively that it cannot be done for one-fourth of 1 per cent., and that no more of the half of 1 per cent. will be used than is absolutely required. Under Secretary Sherman the cost of the funding operation was thirty-five one-hundredths of 1 per cent., and a large part (three hundred million) of the bonds disposed of by him went without any commissions whatever. If his successor does as well, the country will be fortunate.

The Committee on Finance propose to strike out section 5 of the House bill for the reason that it has no necessary or pertinent connection with a funding bill, but is revolutionary and destructive of the freedom and continuance of the national-banking system. It compels the banks to present their 5 and 6 per cent. bonds within thirty days after interest has ceased, and if they neglect to do so, the bank must go into the hands of a receiver. Such bonds cannot be held as security for circulation or for Government deposits, nor is the bank to be allowed to pay the Government in United States legal-tender notes for their outstanding circulation, but they must hunt them up one by one, far and near, and return them to the Treasury; a task which might require years to complete. Any bank having 5 or 6 per cent. bonds is to be compelled to take 3 per cent. bonds at par or to quit the business. Hereafter only the 3 per cent. bonds are to be received by the Government for security of bank circulation or for public deposits. The banks are to be made weaker and then allowed no option whether to stop or go on. The elasticity arising from increasing or diminishing their circulation, as the shifting seasons of business require, is to be hamstrung—not to be increased except by a deposit of 3 per cent. bonds, whether to be had or not, and not to be diminished save by the tedious process of finding and returning the identical issue which bears the name of the bank. An examination of this section, with what of the Revised Statutes it is proposed to repeal and what to re-enact, will show that I have not overstated its character.

It would not be difficult to create a panic among the stockholders of the national banks that would spread among the people and prove very damaging, if not disastrous, to any refunding measure. It is known that banking capital is severely, if not unjustly, taxed—in the Middle and Western States 3½ per cent., and in New England and the Southern over 2½ per cent. This accounts for the fact that there is a smaller number of national banks to-day than in 1876, and $49,994,429 less of capital. Their earnings in 1873 were over sixty-five millions, and only $30,605,589 in 1878, and in 1880 had still reached to no more than $45,186,034. Their dividends for years have averaged but a fraction over 6 per cent., and every year for the past five years from two to three hundred of the banks have paid no dividends whatever.

This proves, first, that the circulation of national-bank notes is growing less and less profitable; and, second, that any large amount of new bonds thrown upon the market must of necessity depress the price. In no event can it be expected that the whole amount of the new bonds will be exchanged for those now outstanding, which bear a higher rate of interest, and other parties willing to trust the Government upon cheaper terms must be found.

Since March 4, 1877, the public debt has been reduced about two hundred million dollars. Not esteeming a public debt a public blessing, I would gladly continue that good work; but I expect no such heavy reductions in the future as we have had in the past. Funding at a lower rate of interest will enable the Government to pay off millions more the coming year and every year thereafter than would be possible under the rates we are now paying. To be successful in our future financial negotiations I do not think it would be wise to go out of our way, and upon a different matter, to pick a quarrel with the national banks. It will be more to our advantage to use them as potential instrumentalities in promoting our refunding operations. If we do that, they will not only take their share of the new bonds, but they will largely aid in the disposal of the remainder. War should not be made upon the national banks at this time, not because we fear them, but because the continued prosperity of the country largely depends upon leaving them full power to co-operate with the Government and full power to loan their capital to the public.

I had hoped that the time had at length arrived when a financial measure involving no partisan irritabilities might receive nearly the unanimous support of the Senate. I had supposed the funding bill left the Committee on Finance with very much of its good-will. We had the aid of the Secretary of the Treasury, whose well-matured opinions the country has learned to respect, whether members of the Senate shall give them any heed or throw them aside as unworthy of the slightest consideration.

In the practical execution of this bill, should it become a law, as proposed by the Committee on Finance, I should rely with confidence upon the discretion of any Secretary of the Treasury to obtain the utmost price for the bonds and Treasury notes which the market would allow. If they were eagerly sought it would be his duty to seek a premium and the highest possible premium. If the rate of interest should then be found to be the smallest fraction too much, the premium by reducing to that extent the principal of the public debt would fully offset any loss in the rate of interest.

Although I am earnestly in favor of the lowest rate of interest at which our bonds can be refunded or floated, it will be seen that even a 4 per cent. bond, if sold for a proper premium, would extricate the Government from any loss.

The Treasury notes are to be issued at a rate of interest not exceeding 3½ per cent. While I am not much in love with this description of Government paper, fearing its temporary circulation may operate to inflate the volume of currency, yet it is probable that any skillful Secretary of the Treasury will seek opportunities by which large blocks of these notes may be temporarily used at as low a rate even as 2 or 2½ per cent.

Congress at this session has no higher duty to perform than that of enacting a wise and entirely practicable refunding act. The report of the Committee on Finance was made after very patient and careful deliberation. I think it would be a very serious mistake to reject any one of their recommendations, and the whole country, according to my information, would hail the passage of this bill as reported to the Senate with very great satisfaction. It deserves, in my judgment, the cordial and united support of every member of the Senate who wishes to preserve our present high standard of public credit, and who also aims to extinguish the public debt at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. President, I do not expect to make any extended remarks on this subject; but, inasmuch as we are called on to vote on the rate of interest that shall be paid by the Government on the loan which is now proposed, I will simply define my position on that subject, and in a very few words.

I think it would be unfortunate if we were to make any mistake in putting upon the market a bond that would not sell or that could not be floated and the amount raised to pay off the debt that is so soon to become due. If I thought we could not sell a bond bearing a less rate than 3½ per cent., then I should very readily go with the committee in this proposed amendment, to enlarge or increase the rate of interest; but looking over the business of the past few years, seeing the amount of money that is now in circulation and seeing the amount, as was said awhile ago by the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL,] of silver that is going a-begging now, it does seem to me that a bond at a lower rate than 3½ per cent. might be floated and the higher-rate debt paid off, and the people thus relieved to the extent of the difference of the interest.

When we come to look at this matter, it appears that we can very well afford to try a 3 per cent. debt or a 3 per cent. bond. I know that we often have quoted to us England's consols at 3 per cent., which are very generally a little under par; but there they never pay their debts; they do not expect to pay them. Here we do pay our debts, and everybody knows that the bonds will be par when the time comes for their maturity, and the nearer you approach their maturity the more certain they are to be worth nearly or quite their face, and generally more than their face.

I know if we had been asked the question four years ago whether we could float a bond at 4 per cent. interest we should have said no, and even up to the time, about two years ago, when we were putting upon the market the 4 per cent. bond, some that were supposed to be the best financiers in the country said that it could not be placed on the market, that it would be a failure. It was so said up to the very time that it was put upon the market, but when sale day came we found the people were not only willing to take them but really anxious to get them. We who were then in this city saw great lines of men around the Treasury waiting their turn to obtain the certificates on which these bonds could be obtained; parties were even hiring and paying men to go and take their turn in the line in order to secure the largest possible amount they could for investment. Those bonds in the short time of two years have gone up to a premium of 13 per cent., and I believe have sold higher than that. In my opinion, if you pass this bill for a 3 per cent. loan, the 4 per cent. bonds will go up to 17 or 18 per cent. premium the very next day after the passage of the bill.

Mr. ALLISON. No doubt of that.

Mr. SAUNDERS. That is my opinion of it. There is another thing. If we retain in this bill the section requiring the national banks to take these bonds in order to make their securities good, there is no question then about their sale, for that of itself will make a market for three-fourths of the bonds at once, or at least in a very short time. But even if we strike that out of the bill as has been proposed by the Committee on Finance, still I believe that there are demands for these bonds that will make them a very popular loan; not only that it can be forced on the market, but that it will be a popular loan sought for with avidity. Where can you invest money to-day that will pay a better interest? There may be some kind of manufacturing going on that is paying more, but it does not require very large sums compared with the amount the Government wants to borrow. I ask the question again, where can money be invested with certainty of payment of both interest and principal that would pay better than would these bonds?

Mr. MORRILL. Out in Nebraska and Colorado.

Mr. SAUNDERS. The Senator from Vermont says in Nebraska and Colorado. There is more money to-day in the banks in Nebraska than they can lend to be used in a legitimate way. I have received letters in the last two days from bankers in Nebraska to that effect, saying that they have more money than they can lend to be used in any legitimate business.

Mr. BALDWIN. Do they loan any portion of it at 3 per cent.?

Mr. SAUNDERS. No, sir; but I have not got through with my statement yet. I say if you take any other kind of bond, if you take a State bond or a railroad bond, the holder has got to pay taxes upon it, and the taxes in our part of the country will very generally average nearly or quite 3 per cent., and I believe from what examination I have given the subject that the taxation is more than 2 per cent. on the average of States. Now, if you add that to the 3 per cent. you have 5 per cent. for your money, and I want to know where people can do better than get 5 per cent. for money at the present time?

I say, then, if you retain that clause which requires the banks to take the bonds, there is no kind of doubt about their being floated. I believe even if that section be stricken out it can still be done. There is a demand all over the country for investments of this kind. There is a large amount of trust funds that by law are required to be invested in Government bonds. Besides, I am not one who is very anxious to pay off the national debt in a hurry. I want to pay a little of it each year, and am willing that the coming generation may help to pay it. It has been a great burden upon the people.

The present generation has fought the battle in the war, and have also borne the brunt of the payment of its cost; the hardest part of the work, to say the least, has fallen upon the present generation, and I am willing to extend the time and let others come in and help pay the balance of the debt. I want to keep the debt within proper bounds, and I want to keep the interest at as low a rate as we possibly can, and in my opinion, with the amount of silver and gold we are coining, this loan will be not only as I have said reasonably sought after, but it will be a very popular loan. There is not a business man in the country who has money unemployed who would not take such a bond in preference to gold or silver. The banks would in my opinion take the certificates or Treasury notes, as under the amendment they are to be called. The banks that have large capital and large deposits have to keep a very large surplus on hand at all times, and that surplus they would invariably, in my opinion, invest in the certificates or Treasury notes here provided for. They would be good in payment to anybody. They might not be a lawful payment, but very few would refuse them, and indeed I doubt if any one would. They would also be a popular currency among the people.

Mr. President, I did not intend nor do I now to make any extended remarks upon this subject. I simply wanted to say that I am in favor of voting for a 3 per cent. bond, believing as I do that it can be put on the market and that it can and will be sustained by the people and the capitalists of the country, and I want also an opportunity given, such as was proposed I believe by the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. KIRKWOOD,] to the people to invest their moneys in these bonds and notes as well as the capitalists. I would give them a chance to take a certain portion of the loan at any rate, because I am sure that there is a class of people in the country who want this kind of security. They want a kind that is not taxed, and where they would not be bothered about getting their interest money. At any rate I would like to see an opportunity given them to subscribe.

With these remarks, Mr. President, I will leave the subject. I desired to say this much before voting on this amendment. I believe a 3 per cent. bond can be sold, and if it can it certainly is our duty to do so. If we can save $2,000,000 a year on this loan it will be a great relief to the tax-payers. I will now leave the subject to others who are better qualified to discuss it than I am.

Mr. ALLISON. Before the Senator leaves this question I should be glad to know from him what length of time he proposes?

Mr. SAUNDERS. I should vote for a 5-20 bond. I want the time extended. I did not allude to that before, but I want the time extended; my remarks will show that I am not in a hurry about paying this debt, and I want to make this a little longer time than the House bill makes it. I shall vote for its being as long as twenty years.

Mr. ALLISON. I only wanted to know the Senator's position.

Mr. McDONALD. Mr. President, the bill under consideration, being entitled "An act to facilitate the refunding of the national debt," is certainly a very important one. From the monthly statements of the public debt as well as from the report of the Secretary of the Treasury we are informed what bonds are redeemable after the adjournment of this session of Congress and before the meeting of the next, and what bonds are payable. It appears that the amount to be paid absolutely is the Oregon war debt, amounting to $711,800. The amount that may be redeemed embraces the outstanding six percents of the July and August loans of 1861 and of the loan of 1863, and the five percents issued under the refunding act of July 14, 1870, as amended by the act of January 20, 1871. The five percents which are about to become subject to redemption form a part of the bonds that were issued under the act of July, 1870, for refunding the national debt. The amount of those bonds, as stated in the Secretary's report, is $469,651,050. The act of July, 1870, authorized the issuance of seventeen hundred millions of bonds in three classes, bearing three different rates of interest, and maturing at different times: First, 5 per cent. bonds to the amount of $200,000,000; next, four-and-one-half percents to the amount of $300,000,000; and next, $1,200,000,000 of four percents.

Mr. FERRY. May I remind the Senator that the five percents were increased?

Mr. McDONALD. Before any of these bonds were issued, on the 20th of January, 1871, Congress authorized the increase of the five percents from $200,000,000 to $500,000,000, and this necessarily took from the number of bonds at a less rate of interest that the act of 1870 authorized to be issued; so that after the amendatory act of 1871 the classes stood $500,000,000 of 5 per cent. bonds, $300,000,000 of 4½ per cent. bonds, and the four percents reduced by the amount that had been transferred to the fives. The first class of bonds were to mature in ten years; that is, they were to become redeemable in ten years, and those are the bonds that we are in part to provide for now.

It will be seen, Mr. President, that after Congress had provided for refunding the national debt in 1870, and had arranged for the classes of securities that were to be issued and the rates of interest that those different classes should bear, before any portion of them was put upon the market the arrangement was disturbed to the extent that I have already stated, by increasing the number of bonds at the higher rate of interest that might be issued by $300,000,000.

From the report of the Secretary of the Treasury it appears that the whole amount that might thus have been issued was not negotiated, as the outstanding five percents now are set down at the sum I have already stated, $469,651,050. These five percents were placed upon the market, and the proceeds were used in taking up the then outstanding bonds that this refunding bill was intended to provide for. But before we reached the point of placing upon the market the 4½ per cent. bonds a movement was made here in the Senate designed to increase the quantity of 4½ per cent. bonds that might be negotiated and to extend the time of those bonds.

On the 25th of February, 1875, the then chairman of the Committee on Finance, Mr. Sherman, the present Secretary of the Treasury, moved that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 478, amendatory of the funding acts of July 14, 1870, and January 20, 1871; which bill was as follows:

That the acts to authorize the refunding of the national debt, approved July 14, 1870, and January 20, 1871, be so amended that the amount of bonds bearing 4½ per cent. interest, authorized to be issued, be increased to $500,000,000; and that they be payable at the pleasure of the United States after thirty years from the date of their issue, instead of after fifteen years.

The second section provided that this should not operate to increase the amount of the bonded debt, and necessarily if it had passed it would have taken that quantity thus added to the four-and-a-half percents from the four percents. When that bill was under consideration in the Senate the question was raised whether the 4 per cent. bond could not be negotiated, and the question was asked why it was necessary in the opinion of the Finance Committee that this transposition should take place. The Senate was then advised that no effort had been made at that time to put upon the market or negotiate the four-and-a-half percents; that the provisions for negotiating the five percents had but just before that been completed, and it was the opinion of the present Secretary of the Treasury that 4½ per cent. bonds could not be negotiated, and certainly not at a fifteen-year option; that they must have this additional extension of time and that the additional one-half per cent. interest would be required to give them currency at par. Not believing that at that time, because the experiment had not been made, I moved to amend the bill by striking out of it that provision which proposed this transposition of bonds from the lower class of interest to the higher; but that motion did not prevail, and on the yeas and nays it was voted down, and the bill, in the form that it had come from the Committee on Finance, passed the Senate on the yeas and nays, but five Senators voting against it. It did not become a law, because it was not passed by the House of Representatives.

Just five years ago the Senate gravely determined and decided that the Government could not expect to negotiate its bonds for a lower rate of interest than 4½ per cent.; that the experiment proposed in 1870, modified by the legislation of 1871, could be carried no further in this gradation of interest from 5 to 4½ and from that to 4, or at least that the most we could expect would be after we had put 4½ per cent. bonds on the market running thirty years for the quantity provided for in that bill then before the Senate, there might be a possibility of our using a fragment of the $1,700,000,000 of the bonds which the act of 1870 authorized at 4 per cent. The 4 per cent. bonds were thirty-year bonds. The series as to time was ten, fifteen, and thirty years.

Fortunately for the country, as we all see now, that bill did not become a law; the House of Representatives declined to respond to it, and although it met with almost universal approbation in the Senate, receiving but five votes in the negative upon its passage, the country now is reaping the benefit of its failure, because shortly after that the Treasury Department was enabled to withdraw the four-and-a-half percents from the market, and even the $300,000,000 authorized by the act of 1870 were never negotiated; only $250,000,000 of them have been put out, having fifteen years to run from the date of their issue; and upon the withdrawal of the four-and-a-half percents from the market the four percents, with an extended time of thirty years, were negotiated without any difficulty, as we all know, and many more could have been taken, no doubt.

But we come now to the point where we are to provide, in part at least, for that debt which we refunded in 1870 and 1871. So far as these five percents are concerned, the ten-year bonds become due before another Congress shall meet after this adjourns, the number that were negotiated being less than the number that were authorized by law. They become due, or rather they become redeemable. The time will have arrived when it was the expectation of those who passed the act of 1870 that the Government would take these bonds up; not that she is bound to do it. They become redeemable on the 1st of May next. The bill before us is designed to provide for them and also for the 6 per cent. bonds that had been issued under previous loans that do not come in any way under the operation of the funding bill of 1870.

Our action in regard to the provision we are to make now for the bonds that thus come within our reach it seems to me ought to more clearly follow up the idea that has all along followed every authorization of the issuance of bonds, and that is that they are to be taken up and paid as soon as it is in the power of the Government to pay them, that there is to be no perpetuity of our bonded national debt. That one leading idea certainly ought to be clearly and distinctly embraced in anything we do now.

It is evident that we have not the money in hand to pay these bonds, although they are subject to be redeemed by us, except in part. It is in our power to pay some portion of them. Undoubtedly to the extent that that can be done it is our duty to do it, and to even go further so far as payment is concerned, and as far as it may be prudent to do so anticipate for a reasonable period any surplus that may come into the Treasury and apply it in that way. But if you delay the payment, as a matter of course that delay will be at some cost; there will have to be something paid for that delay for the use of the money, for money like any other property is entitled to compensation for its use, and that as a matter of course brings up the question of the rate of interest and also the time at which we shall undertake to make payment.

The bill reported by the Committee on Finance and the amendments that they report to it, so far as they relate to the time of payment, meet my fullest concurrence.

The bonds that this bill authorizes—to the amount of $400,000,000 if that number should be required—to be issued are to be what are termed 5-20 bonds; that is, we shall not have the right to pay them until five years, and they will become redeemable at the pleasure of the Government at the end of twenty years.

I am in favor of the amendment proposed by the Committee on Finance as to time. I think that if we succeed in refunding the amount of this debt that we cannot pay at present for a time it puts it in the best shape as a 5-20 bond. There is no reasonable expectation that we shall be able inside of five years to reach that portion of the debt that will be placed in the $400,000,000 of bonds that this bill authorizes; but there will be still enough left to which to apply the surplus revenue and the present balances in the Treasury, with the sinking fund filled up to its legal and proper standard, to be paid in the next five years, without in any manner affecting any right of the Government if the $400,000,000 of bonds should not be optional until the end of five years. I have no great hope that we shall be able to pay off the bonds we are now authorizing before the twenty years, if we are able to pay them then, for it seems to me that we are acting now on an exceptional case so far as our revenue is concerned, and one that we have no right to say from anything we can see now is to continue or at least to increase.

I think the present time, so far as revenue is concerned, is exceptional; but in addition to that, we shall have in 1891 $250,000,000 of 4½ per cent. bonds that were negotiated under the acts of 1870 and 1871 falling due, and it ought to be our object, if possible, not to refund them or any part of them. I should certainly be very glad if this provision that is made now, in view of the calling in of the bonds which are to become redeemable between this and the time the next Congress shall meet, shall be the last refunding act that Congress will be called on to pass with reference to our public debt, and that the $250,000,000 of 4½ per cent. bonds that will come due in 1891 will be taken up and paid without any attempt whatever to extend them. I therefore doubt very much whether the country will find itself, even at the expiration of the twenty years that this will give, more than able to take up and dispose of these bonds thus issued, and then the thirty-year bonds, the four percents that are outstanding and now running, will come in in 1907.

It will be seen that the purpose of this measure is to divide the classes of securities that are to be used in providing for the bonds coming in between the close of this session and the beginning of the next Congress into bonds running for five to twenty years and bearing, according to the bill as it passed the House, 3 per cent. interest; according to the amendment reported by the Committee on Finance, 3½ per cent.; and the residue of this debt to be provided for is to be taken up and paid by the use of Treasury notes bearing a rate of interest not exceeding that which is provided for the bonds. This will put out some $250,000,000 of Treasury notes that run one year without option and are to be redeemed at the end of ten years. You may call that a temporary loan, if you please, where the option comes in at the end of the first twelve months, and into this of course is to go the surplus revenue for the redemption of this class; but in the mean time that class of paper will unquestionably add to the volume of paper credits circulating in this country, not directly as money, but supplying money uses. It makes no difference what provisions may be made, Treasury notes in multiples of $10 up to $1,000 in size and bearing a rate of interest, whatever that rate may be, will unquestionably enter into the paper credits of this country in its business operations, not in absolute terms as money, but as supplying the place of it, and will to that extent increase the paper credit of this country in mercantile use, in business use; and that will have a tendency, in my opinion, to still further for the time being reduce the rate of interest upon Government securities that can be held as investments.

Therefore, while I agree with the committee as to the length of time that the bonds should run, I believe that the experiment of placing those bonds at the lowest rate of interest embraced in this bill is worthy to be made, and ought to be made; for it appears to me now that with this additional increase of a paper credit which this bill provides for, in the issuance of Treasury notes, the prospect of securing par for bonds that may become an instrument of investment and security for money, placed for the purpose of being held at a rate of 3 per cent., is better now than it was five years ago, when the present Secretary of the Treasury, then chairman of the Committee on Finance, informed the Senate that 4½ per cent. was the lowest rate in his judgment that the Government could expect to place her securities at par for, and that 4 per cent. bonds were not even at that time proposed to be placed on the market.

While I am anxious that this measure shall go forth in a form that will secure its adoption and its execution, my inclination is to vote for that rate of interest which the House has fixed in the bill it has sent us, and for the length of time which the Finance Committee proposes. I believe that the Treasury notes might be put at a much less rate of interest, at 2 per cent., but the bill only puts a limit above which they shall not go, and I apprehend that the Secretary of the Treasury, or whoever is charged with the execution of this law, will not increase the rate of interest upon that class of temporary paper used simply for the purpose of anticipating income or revenue and to be taken up inside of ten years. I apprehend that he will not place a rate of interest on it any higher than he can find will make it go in the markets at par, and its being used as a substitute for money in business operations will give it a value in that direction.

The Finance Committee proposed to strike out the fifth section entirely. It may be that that section ought to be amended. I have not examined it with sufficient care to determine whether it ought or ought not, nor do I know that I could suggest the proper amendments if I were to undertake to examine it; but there is one feature in it that I do not think ought to be eliminated from the bill, and that is that feature which requires that after a date named in the bill the bonds provided for here shall be those to be placed with the Government of the United States as a security for circulating notes. I do not think that feature ought to be taken out.

Mr. LOGAN. I am interested in what the Senator is saying, but would like, on that point, to know what difference it would make whether the banks deposited as security a 4 per cent. bond running a long time or a 3½ per cent. bond, so far as the security is concerned?

Mr. McDONALD. I am going to state that very soon. When the act of 1870, the original funding act, was before Congress, after it had passed the other branch of Congress and come into the Senate, it was amended in the Senate, upon the application of the then chairman of the Committee on Finance, Mr. Sherman, so as to require the banks then organized, or those that might thereafter be organized, to absolutely take and deposit the bonds provided for in that act as securities for bank circulation. Those who had already other bonds of a higher rate of interest on deposit in the Treasury were required, on and after a given day named in the amendment, to replace them with the bond provided for by the act of 1870, dollar for dollar, without expense to the Government, or, if the banks failed to do that, they were required to wind up. The present Secretary of the Treasury proposed that amendment in the Senate, and the Senate adopted it. It went to the House, the House refused to concur, and in some kind of a maneuver between the two Houses, through a committee of conference, it was dropped out. That was rather a harsh measure; and yet the Senate and the present Secretary of the Treasury then thought that it was none too harsh, and that the Government under the circumstances had a right to require that kind of a market for its bonds from corporations that were holding their franchise from the Government. That is what was thought then on the part of the Senate. It did not become a part of the law, but it showed very clearly what was thought then in regard to it by men who had given a great deal of thought and study to these questions, as to what right the Government had to make an exaction from corporations who were exercising their franchise rights from the Government.

The fifth section of this bill does nothing of that kind. It simply provides that hereafter when bonds are to be put up as security for bank circulation the banking corporation shall take these bonds. The Government to that extent discriminates in favor of one class of its securities, it is true, but it is a class that it is putting out, that it expects to run for a period of twenty years, a class of securities also that it provides in the very act itself shall not be disposed of except dollar for dollar in gold.

My friend from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] has asked me what difference it makes, so far as security is concerned, whether the banks shall hold the 4 per cent. bonds which they may now have and that are to run some twenty-seven years yet before they become redeemable, or whether they shall be required to put up a 3½ per cent. bond. The banks that are holding the 4 per cent. bonds will hold them still. The banks that are hereafter to purchase bonds for banking securities would have to purchase those 4 per cent. bonds at their premium, whatever it was; and they would be worth just as much relatively and no more, so far as the money is concerned, as the bonds that are provided for in this bill.

If these bonds should be but par, or if there should be a discount upon them, the 4 per cent. bonds would sympathize with them. They would be sold either at 115, or 110, or whatever might be the difference between the cash value of these bonds which we propose to put out under the operations of this bill and the 4 per cent. rate by the difference of premium between the two values; so that the men who would purchase these bonds as securities for bank circulation in the future would not be required to pay any more for their bank securities than they had to pay when they bought 4 or 4½ per cent. bonds, for the Government creates a market for its bonds. The effect of the provision of the fifth section as passed by the House is to create a market for these bonds. The object of the entire banking system, started during the war as a temporary expedient with a power reserved in it of repeal, or alteration, or amendment, was for the very purpose of furnishing to the Government a market for its securities. That was its main object and purpose so far as the Government was concerned. The franchise was conferred upon these corporations in the beginning, as it was then supposed temporarily, with a right to repeal at any time reserved in the very law itself, for the very purpose of providing a purchaser for the bonds of the Government.

I would not do an act of injustice if I knew it in regard to these corporations or any others. I do not think it would be any injustice while the law continues authorizing these corporations to organize, to increase their circulation, or to retire it, to provide that whenever they have occasion to place new bonds on deposit with the Secretary of the Treasury as security for bank circulation, they shall put there these bonds, for which we are now finding a market, so as to aid us to that extent in putting them into circulation. I think it is a fair thing to do. Their securities will cost them no more than if they bought four percents. There is no coercion about it, because they are not bound to increase their circulation; they are not bound to organize banking associations; and if they do one or the other, I think we have a fair right to say this to them. The amendment the Senate put on the act of 1870 said to them: "You must by a given day make this exchange and transfer at your own cost and expense, and without any expense to us, or close up and go into liquidation, and retire your circulation;" but that is not what we say to them in this provision.

Mr. ALLISON. That is not the provision according to the amendment of the Committee on Finance.

Mr. McDONALD. No, sir, that is not the amendment, but the provision as it passed the House, that hereafter for a renewal of circulation or for any new banking institution this class of bonds shall be taken.

Mr. ALLISON. Would it interfere with the Senator if I should ask him a question?

Mr. McDONALD. Not at all.

Mr. ALLISON. Is it not true that the national banks that now hold 5 and 6 per cent. bonds, the bonds to be redeemed under this bill, will have to substitute the 3 per cent. bonds or retire their circulation if the fifth section of the House bill becomes a law?

Mr. McDONALD. No, sir; they may take their redemption after the bonds are advertised for redemption. Then they are required to replace them.

Mr. ALLISON. That is, they would be forced either to retire their circulation and go out of business, or take the 3 per cent. bonds?

Mr. McDONALD. No, sir; I do not understand the provision in that way. I have said that this fifth section as it passed the House might require amendment. I do not propose to put any unnecessary, or unusual, or unfair burden upon the national banks; but I do favor this provision of the House bill, which in regard to the deposit of bonds hereafter made as security for bank circulation, discriminates in favor of these bonds and requires them to be put up in place of others. I say that feature of it I certainly do favor. Whether this section as the House have sent it to us will simply effectuate that purpose or not, I am not able to say. As I said before, I do not know that I could make a proper amendment if I should undertake it, and I do not see any injustice to these banking corporations in thus requiring them to discriminate in favor of bonds that we are proposing to send to the market at par.

Mr. President, I believe I have said about all on this subject that I desire to say, except to call the attention of the Senate to some facts that are brought forward by the Secretary of the Treasury in his report, to indicate the necessity on our part of action in this matter.

Mr. FERRY. Before the Senator passes from the subject he has been discussing, will he give the Senate the benefit of his judgment on the question whether banking corporations would continue their charters if they were required to take circulation based upon a 3 per cent. bond?

Mr. McDONALD. Undoubtedly; as quick as they would upon a 4 per cent. bond, because they would not have to pay relatively any higher for one bond than the other.

Mr. FERRY. The Senator at the same time understands that they pay a taxation of over 3 per cent., national, state, and municipal.

Mr. McDONALD. They pay that tax under the present banking system.

Mr. FERRY. The Senator is aware of the fact that more than one-half of the bonds now held as security for the circulation of national bank bills are six and five percents. Is the Senator in favor of compelling the banks to receive the three percents in the place of those fives and sixes?

Mr. McDONALD. The fact that I wish to call to the attention of the Senate is thus stated by the Secretary of the Treasury in his last annual report:

> Under existing law there is still available for this purpose—

That is for the purpose of buying bonds that become redeemable this next season—

> 4 per cent. bonds authorized by the acts of July 14, 1870, and January 20, 1871, to the amount of $104,652,200. These could now be sold at a large premium, and, in the absence of legislation, it would be the duty of the Secretary, when any bonds became redeemable, to sell the four percents and apply the proceeds to the redemption of such bonds; but the amount of four percents authorized is inadequate to the purpose stated.

That is, they will not afford enough money to pay off all the bonds that come in, the $672,000,000, or about that amount, which become redeemable during the present year. But there is another point in that same connection. Here are over $100,000,000 of 4 per cent. bonds. If they are sold at the present premium they will perhaps be sufficient to pay off the loan of July and August, 1861, which is set down at $145,786,520. Certainly they and the sinking fund would take up that issue. The next item following is the loan of 1863, leaving outstanding and unprovided for that part of the debt which we funded under the act of 1870 in 5 per cent. bonds that become redeemable next summer. That is $469,651,050 left unprovided for; but that would refund $104,652,200 in thirty-year bonds, for that is the time that the four percents would have to run; it would be an extension of that amount of our debt ten years beyond the time that is contemplated by even the amendments of the Finance Committee, and I do not think it is the desire or purpose of the Senate that this should be done.

The very fact that we are here in contention over whether we shall make these $400,000,000 of bonds, provided for in the bill, optional in five years, as five-tens or five-twenties, or even at a shorter period, indicates very clearly that to pass any part of the public debt that we are now seeking to provide for so far beyond the reach of the Government as thirty years is not in the contemplation of the Senate at all; and it makes it the more important that we should act now upon this question in such a manner as to cover the whole of the issue that will become due during the course of the coming summer.

It is true we might stop and do nothing. If we did, the Secretary of the Treasury has informed us in effect that he has control of bonds enough and of sinking fund enough, if he sells bonds at the present premium that they bear in the market, to take up all of the 6 per cent. of the debt that stood back of the funding bill of 1870, that was not embraced in that and was left unprovided for, and the $469,651,050 of the five percents negotiated under the act of 1870. That is the situation, it seems to me, that this matter is in; and if we can come to such a conclusion as will satisfy the public and the moneyed interest of this country that what we have done upon this subject is our ultimatum, that we are ready to put these bonds out upon the terms we prescribe, the bonds will be taken. But if we go at it like the boy who went to market to sell his horse with the declaration that we want $75 for our horse but if we cannot get that we will take $50, then as a matter of course I think we shall be found negotiating for the $50; we shall have to submit to what the moneylenders want.

Mr. COKE. I wish to submit an amendment to be proposed to this pending bill, and I ask that it be printed.

Mr. ALLISON. Let it be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 4, line 15, after the word "canceled," it is proposed to amend by inserting:

And provided, That nothing contained in this act shall be so construed as to authorize the cancellation or retirement of the existing volume of legal-tender Treasury notes, or any part thereof.

Mr. HEREFORD. Mr. President, I am in favor of three propositions: First, I am in favor of refunding this debt, if it is necessary, and I doubt that very much; but if it is necessary, I am in favor of refunding it at the lowest rate of interest; second, the shortest time; and, third, to pay off the whole debt as fast as it can be done without imposing too heavy a tax upon the people.

What argument has been adduced before this body to satisfy our minds that the debt cannot be refunded at 3 per cent.? The Committee on Finance tell us that certain bankers went before that committee and the Secretary of the Treasury went before that committee, and we have his examination before it here in print, and he informed them that it could not be done. But what does history teach us? A few years ago this same Secretary went before that same committee, and these same bankers went before that same committee, and told them that if we passed the silver bill resumption was a matter of impossibility; but we did not heed that Secretary of the Treasury nor those bankers and bankers' clerks who went before them, and we did pass the silver bill, and the Secretary of the Treasury himself afterward admitted that he was wrong and that Congress was right, that the passage of the silver bill, so far from impeding or injuring the resumption of specie payments, aided and abetted it, as I with other gentlemen had the honor on this floor to state that it would do.

We saw what his opinion was worth then, and what the opinion of these bankers and these bankers' clerks was worth. Furthermore, this same Secretary of the Treasury, the same bankers and bankers' clerks, went before that committee and told them that we could not refund our indebtedness at 4 per cent. We did not heed their advice then, and we did fund at 4 per cent., and our bonds were sold with greater rapidity than any that ever had preceded them; so much so that it astonished the Secretary himself and astonished the monetary world. Those four percents that he and those bankers said could not be floated at par are to-day worth 14 per cent. premium.

That is all the evidence that we have had adduced before us. No argument has been made to satisfy the minds of the members of this body that it cannot be done. Why can it not be done? How much is there to fund? Only a little over four hundred million dollars, if you deduct the amount that is in the vaults of the Treasury to-day.

The last statement of the Secretary of the Treasury shows us that there is in the vaults of the Treasury to-day in cash $221,674,535.08. Deduct that from the amount of the six percents and five percents, which aggregate $671,917,600, and you only have a little over $400,000,000 of indebtedness to fund. But it is said we must keep that two hundred and odd million dollars there for resumption purposes. That is very costly resumption, at the rate of ten and twelve million dollars a year. We do not need it there for resumption. As long as the silver act stands no man whom this Government owes $100,000 or a smaller amount is going to the Treasury and demand specie for it. The people of this country do not want it, and the Secretary of the Treasury says in this interview before the committee that the people of this country do not want either gold or silver coin; that they all prefer the national-bank and the Treasury notes. He need not have told us that. Every business man knows the same fact. No man wants to carry specie about with him. The great part of the business of this country and of all countries is not done by handling the money; it is done by clearing-houses and checks. No business man desires to handle the money.

We were told by the Secretary of the Treasury and we were told by Senators on this floor that if we passed the silver bill, as silver was worth less than gold, it was a political axiom which no man would deny that two currencies of different values could not remain in the same country, and that silver being worth less than gold, it would drive the gold out of the country. We asked upon this floor, even when that argument was adduced, why does not silver drive the gold out of France?

Mr. KERNAN. My information is that they have lost nearly all their gold in France, and that it is one of their troubles there.

Mr. HEREFORD. Their reports do not show that fact, and if it has gone from France it has come to our own country, where we have silver in great abundance. It did not seek Germany, where they have nothing but a gold standard; it did not seek England, where they have nothing but a gold standard; but it came to the United States, where we have silver, gold, and paper. Therefore, the argument of the Senator from New York will not do. It was said that this depreciated silver was going to drive gold out of the country. What did the Secretary, or rather Mr. Knox, the Comptroller of the Currency, tell us in his interview the other day with the Senate committee? He told us that there has been brought into this country since the 1st day of January, 1879, an increase in coin of $247,000,000 in two years. Your gold and silver has increased in two years alone in the aggregate of $247,000,000; yet we were told by these same financiers that the silver bill was going to drive it out. This is the authority given upon this floor to-day why we cannot pass and float this 3 per cent. bond.

Mr. TELLER. If the Senator will allow me, I should like to remind him that the then chairman of the then Finance Committee announced that if we passed that bill we should not sell any more bonds at par.

Mr. HEREFORD. Yes, sir.

Mr. TELLER. I thought that might have escaped the Senator's recollection.

Mr. HEREFORD. I am very much obliged to my friend the Senator from Colorado. The then chairman of the Finance Committee, Senator Morrill, of Maine, made the statement that if we passed that bill we could not sell any more bonds, but we have sold them with greater rapidity and at a lower rate of interest since that time than we ever did before, and our bonds are to-day worth more than they have ever been in the history of this country, notwithstanding the passage of the silver bill. When the Secretary was before the committee the other day he filed the following statement:

Statement showing the net receipts, net expenditures, and surplus revenues of the Government for each fiscal year from 1866 to 1880, inclusive.

| Year ending June 30— | Net receipts. | Net payments. | Surplus. |

The Secretary shows there that there has been collected from the people of this country, from 1866 to 1880, inclusive, the enormous amount of $5,326,752,062.10 in fifteen years. More than five billions and a quarter have been wrenched from the people, and at least one-third of that has been interest paid to the bondholders. I think it is high time that this should be stopped. Over five billions and a quarter in fifteen years have the people paid, more than twice the whole amount of the debt at the time that this calculation commenced. The people have paid in fifteen years twice over the whole debt, and yet we are in debt one billion six or seven hundred million dollars. It is high time, brother Senators, that we should call a halt and do something to lighten the burdens of the people.

We are told that we must not experiment; that it is dangerous to experiment. I think we had better experiment a little in favor of the people. Why not experiment? The inference is that we might fail and thereby injure our credit. We had better take that chance, if by taking it we can lessen the burdens of the people. But our credit is not going to be injured by it if we should fail. Suppose you pass the bill and you cannot fund the debt, who is hurt? The debt is not due. We have not agreed to pay it this year or next year, nor at any future time, as was said yesterday by the Senator from Vermont; and if we cannot obtain this money at 3 per cent. what harm is done by the experiment? Let us make an experiment in favor of the people for once at least.

I undertake to say that the surplus money in this country will absorb the whole of this $400,000,000 that we have to fund. I am not mistaken when I say that it is only a little over four hundred million dollars that we have to fund, for it is not that amount, less the cash in the Treasury, as shown by the last statement of the Secretary of the Treasury. As I showed a moment ago, you have over two hundred million dollars in the Treasury.

The surplus money in this country would seek these bonds as an investment. For instance, here is a man who has $10,000. He does not know when he is going to use it; he thinks he may use it six months hence, but he does not wish it to lie idle. What would any successful business man do with it? He would go and invest it in these 3 per cent. bonds. Why? Because by the time he would want to use the money, in the near or far distant future, it will be bearing interest and hence he can always sell it, and if he does not want to sell it he can go to any Shylock in the country and pledge those 3 per cent. bonds of the Government as collateral security and borrow his money upon it.

What is the surplus capital? What have we now as the money that is in the United States? This same Comptroller of the Currency, Mr. Knox, when before the committee, said that we had, November 1, 1890, in round numbers, $346,000,000 of legal-tender notes, $343,000,000 of national-bank notes; of gold coin, $454,000,000; of silver coin, $158,000,000; making, in the aggregate of money that we have in this country to-day, $1,302,798,480. In addition to that, on a page immediately succeeding, he says we have from eighteen to twenty millions of silver certificates; which gives us as the money in this country November 1 $1,322,000,000, and that surplus money must seek an investment.

Mr. President, this debt of ours is a comparatively small one when we take into consideration the wonderful wealth and population and the increasing wealth and population of our country. Some years ago when there was a great debt imposed upon the city of New York that scared some of the tax-payers there, one said to another, "How are we going to pay this enormous debt?" The other gentleman replied, and that is my reply in this case, "Sir, we will grow out of debt." The city of New York did and can grow out of debt, and that is the way the people of the United States will grow out of this debt. Have Senators ever thought of one thing, that when we commenced to pay this debt we only had a population of 33,000,000 people? To-day, as shown by the last census, we have a population of over fifty million, and if we increase in the same ratio in 1891 we will have 66,000,000, and in 1901, only twenty years hence, we will have a population in this country of 90,000,000. Your business and the commerce of the country will increase in the same proportion; your banks and your bank capital will increase in the same proportion; your wealth will increase in the same proportion.

Then do you talk of the inability of this Government to float a 3 per cent. bond? I have listened attentively to all the arguments that have been offered upon this subject and no man yet has shown that the Government is unable to do it. Gentlemen have simply given us their ipse dixit and the ipse dixit of the Secretary of the Treasury and the bankers and the bankers' clerks who appeared before the committee; and we have seen in the past how they have failed in their predictions. We have seen how in the past these same men told us that we could not float a 4 per cent. bond. We have seen in the past how the same men told us that the passage of the silver bill would stop the resumption of specie payments and would drive gold out of the country.

Mr. President, I said that I am in favor of paying the debt off as rapidly as we can, without taxing the people too high. Why? Take these $1,700,000,000 that are to-day invested in Government bonds and pay them off, and let that $1,700,000,000 go into general circulation. Let it go to buy your farms, to buy your lands, your cattle, your horses, your sheep, to build up the manufacturing establishments of the country, and then you will see this country take such a bound as we have never seen in the past. I am against perpetuating the debt of this country. Why are your lands worth so little? Why is everything that the people have to sell worth so little? Simply because capitalists can invest their money in Government bonds. Pay off the debt, wipe out the bonds, and then this country will move onward and upward in prosperity and happiness in an unparalleled degree. Then the mighty West, the giant West, will take a step forward greater than it has ever done in the past. Then the down-trodden South will bloom and blossom as it never has done in the past. Then this money will be sent all over this country to seek investment.

For these reasons among others that I might add, Mr. President, if there is any necessity for funding at all, I am for the 3 per cent. bonds and the very shortest time that can be gotten.

Mr. EATON. I need not say that I regard this as an exceedingly important measure; I need not say that I believe it to be the duty of the Senate, the duty of the legislative authorities, including the Senate, the House of Representatives, and the President, who has his rights as well as we have ours, to pass a funding bill. I shall not go into any discussion with regard to the silver bill. I shall not say anything about the hundred million dollars balance of trade in favor of the United States which made resumption certain. The laws of trade do this, not the laws of Congress. We have to do now with the measure here, a measure of vital importance to the people of the whole country, and we want to do it at the least possible expense to the people of the country.

I cannot vote for this amendment of the committee unless I am compelled to in the end. I shall vote for a bill of some sort, if necessary for this bill, but I cannot vote for it yet. I think a 3 per cent. bond running five to forty years is the true bond to be issued. I want to give my reasons for thinking so. I do not think that a bond that has but five to ten years or five to fifteen years to run can be floated at 3 per cent. A bond running five to forty years, in my judgment, and I base my judgment upon the opinion of many of the shrewdest financiers of the United States, can be floated for 3 per cent. and would be at a premium in less than ten days. I want to show why. I want to show that although we hold the optional year of five it will make no difference here if we give the extent of time to forty years. A 5-10 bond cannot be floated; a 5-40 can, and why? Because we cannot pay the 5-40 at the end of five years; it is impossible; and the capitalists of the country, the people of the country, will see at once from an examination of the bonded debt of the country that it is impossible that these 3 per cent. bonds can be paid at the end of five years, or ten years, or twenty years. Why? We have on the 1st day of July, 1891, the option of paying $250,000,000 of four-and-a-half percents. We have on the 1st day of September, 1907, twenty-six years from now, the option of paying $738,000,000 of 4 per cent. bonds. If you make these bonds five-forties, the Government has really no option. The Government cannot pay the 3 per cent. bond in five years, in ten years, in twenty years, or thirty years, not even if the country has prosperity all the while during that time, and that is not to be expected by any wise man. We have, in other words, the option of paying four-and-a-half percents in ten years and four percents in twenty-six years, amounting to $1,000,000,000 in round numbers, in exact numbers $988,000,000. There are $1,000,000,000 of future interest-bearing bonds, one class 4½ and one 4 per cent.

Then I say to my distinguished friends upon the Finance Committee, and I have no doubt that they have taken that into consideration, if you make this a 5-40 bond, with the immense amount that we have the option of paying within the coming thirty years it will be just like making it a 10-40 bond precisely, and all the financiers of the country, all the business men of the country, all the intelligent men of the country will look at it in that precise light. In other words, we are placing now before the people of the United States a safe investment. By and by I shall have a word to say at another time with regard to the amendment offered by my distinguished friend from Iowa, [Mr. KIRKWOOD,] which I think is exactly in the right direction. The entire people of the country, the men and women of the country, leaving the term financiers, leaving the term men of wealth, leaving the term business men, the old lady in Alabama who has saved up $500 or $1,000, will know that there is a bond here to leave to children or children's children that will have forty years to run, a safe investment. The farmers of the country, the mechanics of the country who wish to invest $500 or $1,000 will see that here is a permanent forty years' investment.

I desire the Senate to think of this. I only wish to state it, not to consume the time of my brethren here. I wish to state plainly, briefly, succinctly, the reason why this bond will stand just as well before the people of the United States, will command investment just as readily as it would if it was a 10-40 bond and if the option was ten years instead of five years. If I fail in this, I shall then ask that this bond be 3½ per cent. if we cannot agree upon 3, which in my judgment we ought to agree upon. In doing so we should save $2,000,000 every year. The difference between 3 and 3½ per cent. is $2,000,000. The difference between 3½ and 3¾ per cent. is $1,000,000 every year. If possible that ought to be saved. The people are taxed enough.

I do not wish to detain the Senate. I have not the slightest doubt but what a 3 per cent. bond at a term of five to forty years can be placed. I know it is the opinion of men whose opinions are of value. Indeed, I do not call it an experiment. Bonds are changing hands every day now. Millions of 4 per cent. bonds are selling every day, and but a trifle over 3 per cent. interest is realized when you take the premium on the bond into consideration. Let us make this a 3 per cent. bond; let it run forty years. We have got our thousand million to pay within the coming twenty-six years, and therefore, in my judgment—I hope I am wrong—the country will not desire to take the option of 5 or 10 or 20. They have got too much to pay on a debt bearing a larger rate of interest to desire to pay any part of the 3 per cent. bonds within twenty-six years, or even thirty years.

Therefore, I shall vote at present against the amendment of the committee.

Mr. VANCE. Mr. President, I feel that in a matter of this kind we ought to hear and to heed what the people say at home, who are most directly interested in a question of taxes, such as this is; and I propose as my contribution to the discussion upon this measure, involving so many millions of dollars to be raised by taxation off the American people, to have read by the Secretary an extract from a letter which I have recently received from one of the most eminent men in my section of the country in all matters that pertain to finance. I think it a compendium, a brief statement of the real truth in this case. I think it could not be stated any better, and that the conclusion to which my correspondent arrives is the one to which the Senate of the United States ought to come, to wit, that these bonds should bear the lowest rate of interest which will enable them to float, and to run the longest period of time that will be expedient. With these introductory remarks, I ask the Secretary to read the letter which I send to the desk.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

The average rate of interest of this country is now not less than 7 per cent., (perhaps 8,) and the Government can borrow at 3 per cent. Why press these burdens upon its industries? If our industries will bear 7 per cent. and the Government can get money at 3 per cent., why not leave it with them? In a new and undeveloped country like ours, with so many objects of profitable investment, there must be a vast accumulation of surplus capital before money will command less than 6 per cent. We will not probably live to see it. The time never was so auspicious for the loan to be refunded at a low rate of interest, and may not occur again in a generation. A public debt is not a national blessing; but even the vast resources of this country may be damaged by the effort to pay such a sum in a few years. To negotiate the loan at 3 per cent. will be the triumph of the financial world, and the use of money at 3 per cent. in such a country as ours can hurt no one. Let foreigners take as many of the bonds as they will, or all, if they desire. It is not true that all the proceeds of the redemption of the present bonds go back to our people. Some are owned by foreigners, and the proceeds of these go abroad. Of the 3 per cent. bonds to be issued, as by Mr. WOOD'S bill, foreigners will probably own the larger portion not absorbed by our banks; but so much the better, as we use their money for development of our country at 3 per cent. This brings working capital in the country, even if we do have to pay back again in thirty or forty years. If in private transactions we require to borrow, and can do so at low rates, we had better take it as long as we will require it. Or if the nation can borrow at 3 per cent. from foreigners and make 7 per cent. per annum of it, it is a good financial operation. The bank rate of dividends or profits is now over 8 per cent. per annum, and they can afford to take the bonds and make fair profits. As you know, our great source of income from banks in the South is from discounts, while in large cities and dense populations the profit is largely from deposits; the rate of discount here being still from 8 to 12, and many persons still have to double these rates in order to get advances to make bread and cotton.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I should like to have the attention of some member of the Committee on Finance a few moments on one point. We all doubtless wish to have the lowest rate of interest we can obtain for these bonds. I would be very glad if I felt satisfied that we could issue and sell at par bonds bearing 3 per cent. interest, but I am not satisfied that we can do that; and I shall therefore vote for the sum named in the amendment of the committee, which is 3½ per cent. But I want to ask the question, why not make the rate of interest provided for by the bill "not exceeding 3½ per cent.?" Why not give to the bonds the same elasticity in that regard that you give to the Treasury notes? There may be some good reason why this is not done, and I think it is due to the Senate from the Committee on Finance that the reason should be given. If you modify the language of the bill in that regard, it enables the Secretary of the Treasury, whoever he may be, to sell bonds at 3 per cent. if he can sell them at that rate. If he cannot, it will authorize him to sell them as high as 3½ per cent., or at any fraction between 3 and 3½, and thus we shall have the opportunity of getting the lowest rate per cent. and yet avoid the possibility of our loan failing. Thus it appears to me; and I should be glad to have the reasons, whatever they may be, that have induced the Committee on Finance not to adopt that language.

Mr. VOORHEES. I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa a practical question, which I address to him as a successful business man, whether he himself would buy a bond bearing 3 per cent. interest when he knew that if he did not buy it at that rate he would have an opportunity directly to buy a bond giving him 3½ per cent.? In other words, this option would simply result in selling the bonds at the maximum rate of interest. It would not operate to sell the low-rate bond. The 3 per cent. bond would not be purchased by the capital of the country when the capitalists knew that in the event of a failure to dispose of the bonds at that rate of interest they are bound to be disposed of at 3½ per cent. That is the reason that operated upon my mind as a member of the committee on this question, and I think it is the view that was taken by the committee entirely upon that point.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I may not agree with the conclusion the Senator has reached as to the effect of such a provision. I think if we were to offer 4 per cent. bonds we could sell them at a premium. If in this bill we provided for the issuance of 4 per cent. bonds we should not sell those four percents at par in the present state of the money market, but would sell them at a decided premium. I do not think that the rate fixed in the bill would necessarily control the sale of the bonds. The point I wish to come at is whether or not, and if not, why not, the Committee on Finance deem it advisable to insert in the bill with reference to the rate of interest on these bonds the language I used, that it shall not exceed 3½ per cent.?

Mr. BAYARD. May I reply to the honorable Senator from Iowa? It would be a solecism in the practice of this Government respecting its funded debt if in the same issues, under the same law, classes of bonds were to be found bearing different rates of interest. There must be in a loan that is of a permanent character, permanent in contradistinction from a temporary loan, a professedly short loan like these exchequer bills or Treasury notes as they are termed in the bill now under consideration, a classification of the bonds, which heretofore has never been marked by having some at one rate of interest and others at a greater or lower rate; nor in offering those bonds which must be offered as a whole would it be desirable or well on any ground to couple with the offer the discretion of the Secretary to place one class or one lot of bonds at lower rates than another. In subscription to a loan many elements of consideration must combine. Not only its date and its permanence, not only its rate of interest but its amount must all be considered. If a loan of this magnitude were to be offered or proposed to be offered piecemeal it would destroy the competency of judgment on the part of those who were disposed to be its subscribers, and therefore diminish the practicability of effecting it.

It would be the first time in the history of this country, or, so far as I know, of any country, where the rate of interest upon a class of Government bonds was left to the shifting discretion of any single official of the Government. It is true of no other government. I hold in my hand a table which is before the Senate, of French loans that have been sold for such prices as they would bring. The table before me will show in the French loans a variation from 57 per cent. up to 82½ per cent. bid for the loan, none sold at par.

Therefore the same effect would be produced of an increased or diminished return to the investor in the rate of interest; but as for fixing a different rate of interest, or rather providing a discretion that should create a different rate of interest upon different bonds issued at the same time on the same loan, I think no precedent whatever can be discovered for that; and therefore I should say it would not be wise and it would be as I said a solecism, and one that I do not think ought to meet the approval of Congress or of the American people, that the rate of interest upon the funded loans of the United States should be discretionary with any official.

That is my reason, and I think we have gone to the very verge when in these short loans upon the Treasury notes, as they are termed, exchequer bills as they might be called, but temporary loans in their character, we propose to give the discretion to the Secretary that he may issue them at a rate of interest not exceeding 3½ per cent.

Mr. BLAIR. I should like to ask the honorable chairman of the Committee on Finance a question. It seems to be conceded that a bond at 3½ per cent. can easily be negotiated. There is no doubt in regard to that?

Mr. BAYARD. I hope not.

Mr. BLAIR. Some entertain the opinion that a bond at a still lower rate of interest can be placed upon the market; at 3 per cent. or 3¼ per cent., as the case may be. It appears to be the policy of the Government that no bond shall be placed upon the market at a lower rate than par. I am unable to see wherein it is to the disadvantage of the United States to issue a 3½ per cent. bond, as compared with a 3 per cent. bond, even assuming that the 3 per cent. bond will float and will be taken at par. I wish to ask the honorable chairman if there can be any such disadvantage, for if the market is such that a 3 per cent. bond will be taken by the capitalists of the country, what is the reason that inevitably a 3½ per cent. bond will not sell at such a premium as that the Government will realize the same as though she placed a 3 per cent. bond?

Mr. BAYARD. Of course the advantage to the Government cannot be excluded. It is certainly so. If the reasoning which has been adopted on the other side be true, it necessarily leads to the result stated by the Senator.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I wish to say a word in answer to my colleague, in addition to what has been already so well said by the chairman of the committee, with reference to this question of placing in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury a discretion with regard to the rate of interest on these bonds. I do not think any Secretary of the Treasury would desire that Congress should place in his hands a discretion with regard to the rate of interest. That is one reason why it ought not to be done; but there is still another reason, which I think is potential in this regard. The question which we are really endeavoring to solve now is what rate of interest will be the average rate at which our securities can be sold at par. The policy of our Government is to receive par for all its securities. This bill, and every other bill, I believe, that has been passed looking to the funding of the public debt, provides that our bonds shall be sold at par.

Now, it is plain to my mind that if you put upon the market a 3 per cent. bond and say that it shall be sold at par, you become at once at the mercy of any class of speculators or owners of securities, whether of United States bonds or other bonds, who may choose to depress the market one-eighth of 1 per cent. Suppose, for example, that the 3 per cent. bonds should be put upon the market and the market be depressed one-eighth of 1 per cent. below par, the moment the depression is made the funding operation must cease. Now, therefore, if we wish to pass a bill which will stop the 5 and 6 per cent. rates of interest we must provide such a medium rate of interest for the new bonds as will enable us certainly to sell them at par; and if the market would justify a higher rate, no prudent or honest Secretary would issue them to the public at par, but would do, as this bill contemplates may be done, offer them at such premium as they will bear in the market.

Mr. BOOTH. May I interrupt the Senator a moment by a question?

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, sir.

Mr. BOOTH. I desire to know if any securities ever offered by the United States were originally sold at above par?

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, sir; the present Secretary of the Treasury sold, if I remember rightly, either fifty or one hundred millions of 4½ per cent. bonds at a rate of 1¼ per cent. premium only two years ago.

Mr. FERRY. May I remind the Senator that the Secretary sold $200,000,000 above par?

Mr. ALLISON. I had forgotten the amount; I knew it was some sum.

Mr. BOOTH. Was there ever a loan offered by the United States that was not worth more than par after the loan was closed?

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, that of course depends upon a great many things. The United States Government has borrowed money hitherto at different rates of interest; and if the United States Government would offer a bond bearing 6 per cent. when another bond could be sold at a less rate, of course that bond would bear a premium. Everything depends upon the rate of interest and the condition of the money markets of the world.

Suppose this bond should be issued at 1 per cent. interest, is it likely, even though it might be sold for the moment at par, that it would ever go to a premium? Of course the question of premium depends upon the amount of the loan, the rate of interest, and the time it has to run.

I believe, from the best examination I have been able to make of this subject, that it is not safe for us if we desire to fund the bonds soon to become payable, to put gyves upon the wrists of the Secretary of the Treasury and manacles upon his feet, and say, "Here, borrow this money at 3 per cent. at par, and if the bonds of the United States go one-eighth of 1 per cent. below par, then stop your operation, and allow," as the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] said so well last night, "the present holders of the 5 and 6 per cent. bonds to put into their pockets $12,000,000 per annum until such time as Congress shall again meet and give the Secretary of the Treasury additional power."

It is for that reason that the Committee on Finance fixed the rate of interest at 3½ per cent., so that there would probably be no peradventure with reference to the ability of the Secretary to negotiate this loan. Then if these bonds go at a premium he can sell them at a premium and put the money realized into the Treasury, and thus secure what the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] hopes to secure, a low rate of interest on the investment. If a 3 per cent. bond was just that rate, I should be willing to make this a 3 per cent. bond; but I think it is not wise to do that.

But I only intended to answer for a moment my colleague and not to speak upon the bill itself at present. I think it is wise for us to place a fixed rate, and if that rate be too high, trust to the integrity and ability of the Secretary of the Treasury to secure a premium upon the bonds.

Mr. PENDLETON. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Iowa who sits before me [Mr. ALLISON] and who is familiar with this matter for an explanation. I sympathize in a great deal that he has said and am profoundly anxious that a funding bill shall be passed, that the option for redemption shall be confined to the shortest possible time, and that the interest shall be fixed at the lowest possible amount. The problem is how we shall do that.

I do not entirely sympathize with him in the statement that it would be unwise, improper, confiding too much power in the Secretary of the Treasury, to fix the limit beyond which the interest shall not go, leaving him, if he shall find the condition of the market suitable, to fix a lower rate. I do not think it necessary that different rates of interest should be fixed by the Secretary for this loan; but my mind has been inclined to the opinion that it would be wise to leave to the Secretary the fixing of the rate of interest in the interval between the passage of the bill and the negotiation of the bonds. Let them all be fixed, then, at the same rate of interest and the issue be made.

I was very much struck with the remarks made last evening by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] in which he described the persons who came before the Finance Committee to give them advice. He stated that interested advice was given by men who assumed the utmost possible frankness. Those who are interested in having no funding bill, the owners of the 5 and 6 per cent. bonds, appeared before the committee and insisted that the rate of interest should be fixed at 3 per cent., in the hope and with the belief that they could so operate upon the market as that the loan would be a failure. I have reason to know that those same holders of bonds are advising other people to insist on 3½ per cent. being named in the bill as the fixed rate of interest, in the hope that there will be a failure to agree between the two Houses, and so the funding bill fail. Their interest is to prevent the funding of the debt. If the bill fails they have accomplished their purpose; if the loan fails they have accomplished their purpose equally well; and we have to-day put upon Congress, put upon the market, put upon public opinion the opinions of men in favor of a low rate of interest in the hope that the loan will fail, and the same men insisting upon a higher rate of interest to other parties in the hope that the bill will fail.

Now, what is the way in which to deal with that question? It seems to me that it is to confide to the Secretary of the Treasury the right to fix the rate of interest at any point below 3½ per cent. that he, instructed by the course of the market before the loan is put upon it, shall determine to be proper. What will be the result? Having the discretion to put a bond at 3½ per cent. upon the market he has secured the availability of the loan; he has secured from the market the possibility of putting out that bond and having it taken and refunding the debt. Therefore the interest of the holders of the 5 per cent. bonds and the 6 per cent. bonds has ceased; their bonds are to be funded at any rate; they go out of the market, whether it is by a 3½ or a 3 per cent. bond they are provided for. What interest is then operating on the market? Not the interest my friend from Iowa seems to suggest, but the interest of those people to whom it is a matter of great importance to float the loan at 3 per cent. They are the holders of the fours and four-and-a-halfs who, if another bond at 3 per cent. can be floated, will realize the benefit of the very large rise in their securities.

The general subject of the financial operations of the Government is one with which I am not familiar, and therefore I speak with all deference and humility; but it does seem to me that if we had a Secretary of the Treasury to whom we could confide a discretion of that kind, in whose honesty we had confidence, in whose integrity and intelligence we had confidence, the proper way to meet these conflicts in the market would be to give him the discretion so as that he could certainly float the loan in spite of the opposition of the holders of the 5 and 6 per cent. bonds, and then, having removed them from their antagonism to the loan, be able to bring to bear upon the market the operation of a large class of moneyed men of the country, the holders of the fours and the four-and-a-halfs, to secure for the Government the floating of this loan at 3 per cent. You put it in his hands to remove the objection of the holders of the five and six percents, and after having driven them from the field by the certainty that their bonds will be funded you bring into play the operation of these other forces in the market whose interest it is that your bonds shall bear only 3 per cent.

These are the suggestions that have occurred to me, and as the Senator from Iowa was on his feet on that subject I should desire, if he thought it worth while, that he should enlighten me and the country on that point. No doubt he can.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, of course I cannot enlighten the Senator from Ohio upon that point or any other; but the difficulty that I see in the way of his suggestion is that you cannot get the 5 and 6 per cent. bonds out of the way until you have negotiated the loan provided for in this bill. I can very readily see that at some time, after this loan shall have been taken, it will be the interest of the holders of four percents and four-and-a-half percents to advance those bonds in the market, and in advancing them of course they will advance the bonds bearing a lower rate of interest, whether it be 3 or 3½ per cent., and if it be 3½ per cent. I think it quite likely that at some time in the future these bonds will bear a slight premium in the market; but it would be a very favorable money market that would induce a premium on even a 3½ per cent. bond. Now, the 4 per cent. bonds are selling in the market at 113 or perhaps 113¼ to-day. I do not know what the latest price is, as I have not looked; but these very bonds are fluctuating in the New York market at the rate of one-fourth, or one-half, or three-fourths of 1 per cent. every day. What does that show? It shows that if you put a 3 per cent. bond on the market and there is no fluctuation of a quarter of 1 per cent., the Secretary of the Treasury is stopped in his operations until the par is restored. Is it a wise thing to put any Secretary of the Treasury upon such a narrow margin as that, where it will be in the power of any set of men by bearing the bonds one-eighth of 1 per cent. to stop entirely the operations. And yet that is the difficulty you encounter when you undertake to put the Secretary of the Treasury upon this margin. The 4 per cent. bonds to-day are realizing to the investor 3½ per cent. interest per annum, or one-fourth per cent. higher than you propose. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] shakes his head. I have not trusted my own arithmetic, but have asked the arithmetician of the Treasury Department, Mr. Elliott, and he computed this for me at 113, the value of 4 per cent. bonds in the market. If the present market rate of four percents yields to the investor 3½ per cent., why is it that we should tie the hands of the Secretary and only authorize him to issue a loan bearing 3 per cent.?

The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. SAUNDERS] a while ago said a very true thing when he said that the effect of this bill at 3 per cent. would be to put the 4 per cent. bonds to 118. So it would and probably to 122, and the men who hold the 4 per cent. bonds to-day could sell them out a month or sixty days from now and receive a profit of 6, 7, or 8 per cent., put it in their pockets, and in the mean time the Secretary of the Treasury would be "whistling down the wind" in an attempt to negotiate the 3 per cent. bond. They would have no interest in the subsequent proceedings, having pocketed this premium of 6 or 7 per cent. realized by the legislation which we are enacting here to-day. That is the trouble.

Mr. PLUMB. Will the Senator from Iowa permit me to ask a question?

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, sir.

Mr. PLUMB. Why should any man buy a 4 per cent. bond at 122 in place of buying a 3 per cent. bond at par?

Mr. ALLISON. For the reason that the 3 per cent. bonds are to be payable presently; they are to be paid in five years from this time, for I have not much faith in the arithmetic of my honorable friend from Indiana [Mr. McDONALD] who in the early part of the day presented to us such a glowing picture of the growth and prosperity of our country and in a few hours afterward told us that we were not likely to have a large surplus of money by reason of taxation. The Secretary of the Treasury in his report shows that for the next ten years to provide for the sinking fund alone will require $520,000,000. Not one single dollar of our indebtedness can be redeemed except the bonds and Treasury notes authorized by this act. Therefore, it is safe to presume that nearly this entire loan will be redeemed and taken up within the next ten years, the sinking fund requiring $520,000,000. This then is a short bond. The 4 per cent. bonds run twenty-six and a half years. Is not time an important element in this affair? Would not the national banks prefer to pay a small shade of premium, nay, 1 or 2 per cent. more or 3 per cent. more, for a bond that is to run twenty-six and a half years, that they can put in their vaults for that length of time, rather than to use for bank circulation or bank reserve a bond which they know in the nature of things will be called in in five or six years? There is the difference.

I repeat, therefore, what I said before, that if this bill shall pass as it came to us, my opinion is that the 4 per cent. bonds will advance not to 18 or 19 premium—what would make the difference—but they will advance presently 2 or 3 per cent. beyond that, and then when the 3 per cent. loan fails, if it should fail, (as I hope it will not, because we are all interested in securing the loan at the lowest possible rate,) the four percents fall back again to their normal rate, and the speculators in them will have pocketed in the mean time the difference of 7 or 8 per cent.

Mr. McPHERSON. May I ask the Senator from Iowa a question before he sits down?

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. McPHERSON. He appears to express a great sympathy for the Secretary of the Treasury. I do not know whether it is the present Secretary or the prospective one that he wishes to keep out of difficulty; but there is one point in his argument upon which I want a little light. He discusses this question entirely upon the idea that this is a popular loan; that the people are to be permitted to subscribe to it. If that be so, it is a loan placed before the people of this country in an entirely different form from any other loan which has yet been offered to the people. The 5 per cent. bonds, the 6 per cent. bonds, the four-and-a-half percents, the four percents, were sold to a syndicate, not at their par value, but at a large commission below their par value. Had it been a popular loan the people or the Government would have been benefited to the extent of that which the syndicates have reaped as a reward for their toil.

Now, I submit that it makes no difference whatever to the Government what the market value of the bonds may be twenty-four hours after they have gone into the possession of the syndicate. You may issue to-day a 3½ per cent. bond. Within two weeks, within twenty days after that bond has been sold to the syndicate, it will be bulled in the market by them to a point where the investor must pay 5 or 6 per cent. premium upon the bond. I do not suppose that it is the intention of the present Secretary of the Treasury or the prospective Secretary of the Treasury to do otherwise with the 3 or the 3½ per cent. bonds than to know when the bonds are issued what the Government is to receive for them, what will be the price at the par value with the discount allowed to the syndicate. It matters not to the Government whether the bonds on the market be one-eighth per cent., one-fourth per cent., or one-half per cent. lower to-day than they are to-morrow. The Government has disposed of its securities; it has been paid the value for them, and the value we place upon them, not the value the Secretary may place upon them; for I submit he has nothing whatever to do with it. He is simply the agent of Congress, authorized, instructed by Congress to offer this bond to the public. What does he do with it? I have no way of judging of the future except by the past, and judging by the past, the present Secretary of the Treasury has in every case sold the bonds to a syndicate. I repeat it, sold the bonds to a syndicate of capitalists. They have reaped the profit that should have gone into the pockets of the people.

Mr. ALLISON. Why, Mr. President, the Senator from New Jersey forgets that the Secretary of the Treasury, only a few years ago, in pursuance of an act of Congress which we passed on the 25th of February, 1879, put out a large amount of the 4 per cent. loan to the public.

Mr. McPHERSON. I ought to have made that exception. I remember now that one particular case; it was at a time when I suppose it would perhaps not have been wise to have given the balance of that issue of bonds to a syndicate except at a very high premium.

Mr. ALLISON. The loan was put out by the Secretary of the Treasury as a popular loan, and people stood in rows at all the post-offices and sub-treasuries taking that loan; and why? Because by our act of February 25, 1879, we authorized that loan to be taken at par; and if the Secretary of the Treasury had not been directed to sell those bonds at par he would undoubtedly have realized a premium for the remainder of the $149,000,000, or whatever sum it was, of the 4 per cent. bonds at that time. But the Senator from New Jersey has not taken note of the fact that I offered this morning an amendment to this bill, with the informal sanction of the members of the Committee on Finance, proposing that this shall be a popular loan in the sense that it shall go to the people of the United States, who shall be permitted to offer proposals for the loan at not less than par, so that it shall be open to all the people, and not to a syndicate of bankers, as the Senator suggests.

Mr. FERRY. I desire to correct a statement the Senator from New Jersey has made. I think about fifty million dollars of the four per cents were sold for resumption purposes and about eighty million dollars through the syndicate and over six hundred million dollars by popular subscription.

Mr. VOORHEES. With the permission of the chairman of the committee having charge of the bill, I shall move that the Senate do now proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. BAYARD. I hope the Senator will withdraw that motion. I am anxious to have the question settled as to the time when the Senate will decide this matter. I have no disposition to press the bill unduly; its importance must be recognized by the Senate and their discretion must control it. It certainly cannot be ended to-night, but I shall ask the Senate that it be ended to-morrow, and that we shall conclude the consideration of this bill before adjournment to-morrow. I would suggest to the honorable Senator from Indiana whether he had better not withhold his motion until five o'clock and then make it. It is now only half past four.

Mr. VOORHEES. I will withdraw the motion at the Senator's suggestion. I comply cheerfully with the request of the chairman having charge of the bill, with the hope that in the mean time the vote may be taken on this amendment, and at five o'clock I shall renew the motion.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President——

Mr. EATON. I wish to ask a question before my colleague proceeds. A part of this section I approve of. I want to know if it would be competent to amend the amendment by striking out the words "and one-half," so that the vote might be taken on 3 per cent.? If that be adopted, I shall then desire to offer another amendment.

Mr. WHYTE. If the amendment be not adopted, 3 per cent. will be left as the rate.

Mr. EATON. I want to try 3¼.

Several SENATORS. You can do it now.

Mr. EATON. Then I move to amend by striking out the words "one-half;" so as to read, "at the rate of 3 per cent. per annum."

Mr. BAYARD. That amendment has not yet been adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. INGALLS in the chair.) The question is on agreeing or disagreeing to the amendment reported by the committee to insert the words "and one-half."

Mr. EATON. Then let me ask the Chair for information. Suppose this amendment is adopted, is it competent then to move to amend the amendment by striking out the words "one-half" and inserting "one-fourth?" No. Therefore I desire a vote upon my amendment to the amendment to strike out the words "one-half."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would suggest to the Senator from Connecticut that those words are not yet in the bill. The question before the Senate is whether they shall be inserted in the bill or not, as the committee have recommended.

Mr. EATON. That I understand; and then comes my other question: Suppose they are adopted, then is it competent in the Senate to amend by striking out "one-half" and inserting "one-fourth?" I think my amendment to the amendment is clearly in order. I will take the opinion of the Chair, of course.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair holds that the question before the Senate is whether the amendment proposed by the Committee on Finance, which is to insert the words "and one-half" after the word "three," shall be agreed to by the Senate.

Mr. THURMAN. I think, if the Chair will reflect for a moment, he will see that that is amendable. The amendment of the Senator from Connecticut is not too remote at all. There is an amendment proposed by the committee; it is to insert the words "and one-half." Now, that is amendable.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair did not hold that it was not.

Mr. THURMAN. The Senator from Connecticut may move, as he has a perfect right to do, to strike out the word "half" and insert "quarter."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would suggest to the Senator from Ohio that the words "one-half" are not in the bill to be stricken out.

Mr. THURMAN. If the amendment is not agreed to then it will be "three," and the Senator can move to add anything; but the trouble he has is that if the Senate agree to the amendment of the committee and insert the words "and one-half," they are fixed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senate agree to the amendment reported by the Committee on Finance?

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President, I desire at some time before this amendment shall be acted upon to offer a few suggestions in relation to it. If the Senate desire that I should go on to-night I will do so, but I would prefer that the Senate should go into executive session at this time.

Mr. MORRILL. I move, then, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. COCKRELL. Will the Senator from Connecticut yield a moment to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. PLATT. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I shall not detain the Senate three minutes.

Mr. MORRILL. I withdraw my motion if any gentleman desires to speak.

Mr. LOGAN. Before the Senator from South Carolina proceeds I desire to ask a question whether the amendment Senators have been speaking to applies to both classes, to the bonds and the Treasury notes, or whether it applies to the bonds alone?

Several SENATORS. To both.

Mr. LOGAN. I want to understand from the chairman whether or not the amendment applies to the bonds or to the notes separately.

Mr. BAYARD. If the Senator will read a few lines further on he will see that there is a second amendment applying in different language to the Treasury notes. Therefore, this amendment will not affect the rate of the Treasury notes but only the bonds.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I simply desire to explain very briefly my vote on this amendment, I shall not attempt to go into a full debate of the whole subject. It has been so ably and fully argued by others that I shall not attempt it.

I shall vote for 3½ per cent., the rate recommended by the Finance Committee. I would have preferred a long bond, say 5-40 or 5-30, which by the concurrent testimony of all parties could be easily floated at par at 3 per cent. I am in favor of this long bond at a low rate of interest, and relief to the people by the reduction of taxation. This generation has paid very nearly one thousand millions of the public debt, besides the enormous current expenses of the Government, and it would be fair and proper, in my judgment, that posterity should pay their share of it. They will be better able than we are, and the burden would be much lighter upon them.

It is more important to reduce taxation now, and maintain Government securities at par at a low rate of interest, than to keep up the strain of high taxation upon the present generation, and in that proportion impair our vitality and energy.

I know, Mr. President, how easy it is to glorify and felicitate ourselves upon our ability to pay off our vast debt in a short time, and this glorification and assumption is in a large measure justified by the exceptionally prosperous times, large harvests, and marvelous development of the last few years. These conditions have given us a large balance of trade, and surplus revenues.

But reverse those conditions. Let us experience two or three crop failures and a falling off in our present great business activity, a stringency in our money markets, and we may have to resort to financial expedients to meet our obligations and maintain the public credit that would lose us much of the vantage-ground we have gained. And I therefore prefer to take no chances, but adopt such measures for funding the bonds coming due as will enable the Government to take care of its credit without embarrassment. I am admonished that a long bond, a 5-40 or 10-40 or 10-30, cannot pass this Congress, and as some legislation is said to be necessary, I shall take the next best proposition, which is a 3½ per cent. 5-10 or 5-20 bond.

If our present favorable conditions continue, the accumulation of surplus revenues will enable the Government to pay off the obligations at its option after five years and stop all interest. If not, we shall be able to carry the debt at par without trouble.

Mr PLATT. Mr. President——

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. If the Senator from Connecticut will give way, I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. PLATT. With the understanding that I hold the floor.

Mr. BAYARD. I desire to ask the Senate to conclude the consideration of this bill in to-morrow's session before an adjournment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will take notice of the request of the Senator from Delaware. The Senator from Wisconsin moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After thirty-five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at five o'clock and twenty minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, February 17, 1881.

The Senate met at eleven o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

DISTRICT LIQUOR LICENSES.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the commissioners of the District of Columbia, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 10th of January, the names of all persons applying for liquor licenses for the year commencing November 1, 1880, together with the signatures appended thereto, and their action on such applications; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT presented a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting the petition of Captain William Mills, Second Infantry, praying that he be granted pay as acting second lieutenant from January 5, 1862, to February 19, 1863; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented the memorial of Thomas Mitchell and others, citizens of Clark Centre, Illinois, surviving soldiers of the war for the Union, remonstrating against the passage of the bill (S. No. 496) providing for the examination and adjudication of pension claims; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. INGALLS. I present a resolution adopted by the Legislature of Kansas relative to the diseases of live stock. It is customary, I believe, to have resolutions of State Legislatures printed in the RECORD.

The resolution was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

House resolution.

Whereas it appears that a malignant and fatal disease, heretofore unknown, is now prevailing among the herds of cattle on the Pecos Valley, New Mexico, which disease is spreading northward and is threatening to reach the herds of Kansas; and

Whereas the owners of said infected herds are now petitioning the national authorities to cause said disease to be investigated: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the house of representatives of the State of Kansas, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be, and the same are hereby, requested to urge upon the proper Department of the General Government that a commission of competent veterinary surgeons be immediately dispatched to the infected region in order that the causes, remedies, and preventions of said disease be ascertained before it reaches the grazing regions of Kansas; and that a copy of these resolutions be forthwith transmitted by our secretary of State to each member of our delegation in Congress.

Adopted by the house, February 4, 1881.

Attest: WIRT W. WALTON,
Chief Clerk.

I, James Smith, secretary of State of the State of Kansas, do hereby certify that the foregoing is a true and correct copy of the original resolution which passed the house of representatives February 4, A. D. 1881, on file in my office.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto subscribed my name and affixed my official seal at Topeka, Kansas, this 9th day of February, A. D. 1881.

[SEAL.] JAMES SMITH,
Secretary of State.

Mr. INGALLS presented a resolution of the Legislature of Kansas; which was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands, as follows:

House concurrent resolution No. 18, relating to lands in Allen County claimed by certain railroad companies and by settlers upon said lands.

Whereas a controversy has existed for many years between the Missouri, Kansas and Texas Railway Company and the Leavenworth, Lawrence and Galveston Railway Company, now known as the Kansas City, Lawrence and Southern Railway Company, upon the one side, and the settlers upon certain lands hereinafter mentioned upon the other side, respecting the title to certain lands in Allen County occupied by said settlers; and

Whereas said railway companies claim said lands by virtue of certain acts of Congress, making grants of lands to the State of Kansas for their benefit; and

Whereas said settlers claim that said railway companies have no right to said lands; that the same do not lawfully belong to said railway companies, and that the said railway companies have no just, legal, or valid claim to said lands; and

Whereas it is highly important to the material interests of this State, to the welfare of said settlers, as well as of said railway companies, that said controversy be settled and determined by the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States; and

Whereas it is impracticable and almost impossible to have the respective rights of the adverse claimants to said lands settled by the institution of private suits, because of the large number of tracts of said lands, aggregating not less than four hundred quarter-sections in said county of Allen; and

Whereas said settlers are, many of them, in poor and destitute circumstances, and unable to bear the expense of carrying on, each in his own behalf, a separate and independent suit, and have therefore united in an organization called "The Settlers' Protective Association," for the purpose of securing by due and lawful means a decision of the questions involved in said controversy; and

Whereas all questions affecting the title to said lands can be settled and determined in a single suit, brought in the name of the United States, for the cancellation of the patents issued to said railway companies for said lands; and

Whereas said settlers are willing to pay the expense of such suit, and only desire the use of the name of the United States to enable them to obtain their legal rights: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the house of representatives of the State of Kansas, (the senate herein concurring,) That we respectfully request the Congress of the United States to pass an act directing the Attorney-General of the United States to authorize a suit to be instituted in the circuit court of the United States for the district of Kansas, against said railway companies, to test the questions involved in the controversy above mentioned, and to settle the rights of the settlers and of the railway companies in said lands, under such rules, regulations, and restrictions as may seem proper to protect the United States from expense; and

Be it further resolved, That we most earnestly request our Senators and Representatives in Congress to introduce the proper measures to accomplish the desired result, and that they use all proper influence to secure the passage of such measures; and

Be it further resolved, That the secretary of State is hereby instructed to furnish a copy of this preamble and these resolutions to the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States, and to each Senator and Representative in Congress from the State of Kansas.

I, James Smith, secretary of State of the State of Kansas, do hereby certify that the foregoing is a true and correct copy of the original resolutions on file in my office.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto subscribed my name and affixed my official seal this 10th day of February, A. D. 1881.

[SEAL.] JAMES SMITH,
Secretary of State.

Mr. FERRY presented the memorial of E. B. Bell and 20 others, citizens of Camden, Michigan, ex-soldiers of the Union, remonstrating against the passage of the bill (S. No. 496) providing for the examination and adjudication of pension claims; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. PENDLETON presented resolutions of the Chamber of Commerce of Cincinnati, Ohio, favoring the repeal of the law levying a special tax on the capital and deposits of banks and bankers, and also the tax on bank-checks; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented resolutions of the Bar Association of Cincinnati, Ohio, favoring the passage of the bill (S. No. 817) to authorize the erection of a statue in honor of Chief-Justice John Marshall, formerly of the Supreme Court of the United States; which were referred to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. WALLACE presented a memorial of citizens of Greenville Centre, Bradford County, Pennsylvania, remonstrating against the passage of the bill (S. No. 496) providing for the adjudication and examination of pension claims; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WHYTE. I present a memorial signed by George S. Brown, Francis T. King, Tucker Smith & Co., William Woodward, and nearly 500 prominent citizens of Baltimore, Maryland, in behalf of Indian schools. As it is very short I ask that the memorial itself may be read without the names, and the bill relating to these schools having passed, I ask that it lie on the table.

The memorial was read and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

Memorial to the Congress of the United States in behalf of Indian schools.

We, the undersigned, citizens of the city of Baltimore, and of the State of Maryland, being thoroughly convinced of the necessity of making a proper provision for the education and civilization of the Indian youth in our Territories, by the agency of such schools as those at Carlisle, Pennsylvania, and Hampton, Virginia, do most respectfully petition the Congress of the United States to establish similar schools at military posts, and where they be most useful, by making such appropriations as may be necessary for their support; believing that in the end the measure will be justified, be the highest considerations of our duty and policy, in the best solution of the Indian problem.

Mr. MORGAN. I present a memorial of the General Assembly of Alabama; and, as it is brief, I ask the Secretary to read it.

The memorial was read, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands, as follows:

Joint memorial of the General Assembly of Alabama to the Congress of the United States, praying for a grant of land to aid in the construction of the Tennessee and Warrior Rivers Railroad.

Your memorialists respectfully represent that whereas the General Assembly of Alabama did, on the 14th day of February, A. D. 1872, adopt a joint memorial, addressed to the Congress of the United States, praying the passage of an act granting land in aid of the construction of the Tennessee and Warrior Rivers Railroad for the reasons therein set forth; and whereas the General Assembly of said State did, on the 26th day of January, A. D. 1875, adopt a joint memorial directed to said Congress of the United States, praying an appropriation of money for the improvement of the navigation of the Warrior River, between Tuscaloosa and Demopolis, in said State, setting forth in said memorial fully the reasons therefor; and whereas the General Assembly of said State of Alabama did, on the 4th day of March, A. D. 1876, adopt a joint memorial to the Congress of the United States, praying an appropriation of money for the survey of the Sipsey River, in said State, all of which said memorials had for their object the opening up, settling, and improving, and developing the same portions or sections of said State, and which memorials are fully set forth in the United States Senate Miscellaneous Document No. 55, second session Forty-fifth Congress; and whereas the Tennessee and Warrior Rivers Railroad Company, a corporation duly chartered, and existing by and under the laws of the State of Alabama, has a bill now pending in the Senate of the United States, praying a grant of land in aid of its construction; and whereas your memorialists looking upon the said railroad line and its early completion as a matter of vast public importance to both the said State and to the country at large in this that it will open up to settlement and to the commerce of the world a section (as set forth in the aforesaid memorial) valuable in mineral deposits, water power, timber, and agricultural resources which is now to the world like a sealed book; and in view of the great importance of this line of railway, and in view of the further fact that the section through which it passes still remains nearly in the same condition as described in said joint memorial approved March 4, 1876, to which especial attention is called, the said lands still remaining mainly in the hands of the General Government; and in view of the further fact that it seems impossible to open up or settle any section of country not possessing railroad advantages or facilities, your memorialists would therefore respectfully urge upon the Congress of the United States the passage of the bill now pending in the Senate, praying a grant of land to aid in the construction of said Tennessee and Warrior Rivers Railroad.

JOHN D. RATHER,
President of the Senate.
N. H. R. DAWSON,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Approved December 8, 1880.

R. W. COBB, Governor.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia, presented a resolution of the Legislature of West Virginia in favor of the passage of a law to regulate the traffic on interstate railways; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented additional papers to accompany the bill (S. No. 1973) for the relief of the heirs of Nathaniel Kuykendall; which were referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BOOTH presented the memorial of W. B. Williams, of San Francisco, California, in behalf of the match manufacturers of California, remonstrating against the repeal of the stamp tax upon matches; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SLATER, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1729) for the payment of certain Indian war bonds of the State of California, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. FERRY, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post Roads, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 2043) for the relief of Sabin Trowbridge, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. BALDWIN, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. No. 159) in relation to the barge W. I. Spicer, reported it without amendment.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1796) to provide for the erection of a public building for the use of the post-office and Government offices at the city of Terre Haute, Indiana, reported it with amendments.

Mr. DAWES, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 2178) to authorize the construction of a fire-proof building at Columbus, Ohio, reported it with amendments.

Mr. McDONALD, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 936) relinquishing the right of the United States to an island therein named, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

POST-ROUTE BILL.

Mr. MAXEY. I give notice that by direction of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, on Monday next I shall report back the bill (H. R. No. 7036) to establish post-routes, and I ask Senators interested in that bill to have their amendments referred to the committee that it may have time to consider them. I also give notice that I am directed by the committee to ask for the consideration of the post-route bill at that time.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I offer an amendment to the bill referred to by the Senator from Texas, and I move that it be referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads and printed.

The motion was agreed to.

FRAUDULENT PATENT VENDORS.

Mr. VOORHEES submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate be, and it is hereby, instructed to inquire into the best method of protecting innocent purchasers from the impositions practiced by the fraudulent vendors of patents and patent-rights, and report by bill or otherwise.

COLUMBIA RIVER IMPROVEMENTS.

Mr. SLATER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved by the Senate, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to transmit to the Senate the late report of Colonel Gillespie submitting plans for the improvements of the mouth of the Columbia River, together with the report of the board of engineers thereon.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE POTOMAC.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President——

Mr. WITHERS. I ask to call up, with the consent of the Senator from Delaware, what is always regarded as a matter of privilege, the report of the conference committee on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 1381) to authorize the construction of a free bridge across the Potomac at or near Georgetown in the District of Columbia.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection to the request of the Senator from Virginia. The report will be read.

Mr. INGALLS. The report has been read, and it was laid over yesterday at my request that it might be printed. I have examined it and am satisfied that the report is correct and that the Senate should agree to it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is, Will the Senate concur in the report of the committee of conference?

The report was concurred in.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

Mr. BUTLER. I offer an amendment relative to the survey of the Blue Ridge Canal to the river and harbor bill, and I ask that it lie on the table. I shall call it up at an early day with a view of submitting some remarks upon it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will lie on the table, subject to the call of the Senator.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 6613) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic service of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House had concurred in the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 2331) granting pensions to the widow and minor children of Michael Meenan, deceased.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following bills:

A bill (S. No. 1070) granting a pension to Jacob H. Eppler; and

A bill (S. No. 1802) granting a pension to Ann M. Paulding.

The message also announced that the House had concurred in the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 6969) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes.

The message further announced that the House had concurred in the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the bill (H. R. No. 6730) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolution, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 6034) for the relief of the personal representative of George W. Henderlite, deceased;

A bill (H. R. No. 6847) to provide for the distribution of unclaimed dividends among the creditors of national banks; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 393) authorizing the Secretary of War to loan certain tents, flags, &c., to the Masons at Louisville, Kentucky.

The message further announced that the House had disagreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 3788) granting an increase of pension to William Hamill, asked a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. R. L. TAYLOR of Tennessee, Mr. G. R. DAVIS of Illinois, and Mr. J. W. COVERT of New York, managers at the conference on the part of the House.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolutions; and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

A bill (S. No. 711) amending the charter of the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. No. 6201) granting a pension to Thomas Worthington;

A bill (S. No. 1928) to provide for remitting the duties on the object of art awarded by the Berlin International Fishery Commission to Professor Spencer F. Baird;

A bill (H. R. No. 1327) to grant lands to Dakota, Montana, Arizona, Idaho, and Wyoming for university purposes;

A bill (H. R. No. 6942) to fix the times of holding the district and circuit courts of the United States for the western district of Texas;

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 152) granting the use of artillery, tents, &c., to be used at the soldiers' reunion to be held at Lincoln, Nebraska, in the month of September, of 1881; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 337) authorizing and requesting the President to extend to the Government and people of France and the family of General La Fayette an invitation to join the Government and people of the United States in the observance of the centennial anniversary of the surrender of Lord Cornwallis at Yorktown, Virginia.

WILLIAM HAMILL.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I ask that the request of the House for a conference on House bill No. 3788 be acted on now.

The Senate proceeded to consider the action of the House of Representatives non-concurring in the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 3788) granting an increase of pension to William Hamill, and asking a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

On motion of Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois, it was

Resolved, That the Senate insist upon its amendment to the said bill disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and agree to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

By unanimous consent, it was Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the Vice-President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT appointed Mr. WITHERS, Mr. DAVIS of Illinois, and Mr. KIRKWOOD, as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WALLACE. I submit the report of the committee of conference upon House bill No. 6730, the Indian appropriation bill. The conferees have agreed upon all the items of disagreement between the two Houses, with a single exception, the item with reference to the expenses of the peace commission, as it is called, and they have disagreed upon that subject. I ask for the adoption of the report of the conference committee.

The report was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 6730) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various tribes for the year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, and 27, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: Restore in each case the words "including traveling expenses of agents:" and the Senate agree to the same.

As to the amendments numbered 30 and 31, the committee are unable to agree.

JAS. B. BECK,
WILLIAM A. WALLACE,
WILLIAM WINDOM,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
ERASTUS WELLS,
O. R. SINGLETON,
JAY A. HUBBELL,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask what will be the effect of an agreement to that report?

Mr. WALLACE. The effect, as I understand it, is simply to agree upon all the items agreed upon by the conference, and the proposition disagreed to will be the subject of another conference.

Mr. ALLISON. Upon that single item?

Mr. WALLACE. Upon that single item. That is the effect of it.

The report was concurred in.

CONSULAR AND DIPLOMATIC APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. EATON submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 6613) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic service of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by said amendment insert the following: "Chargé d'affaires and consul-general;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Managers on the part of the House.

The report was concurred in.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WINDOM submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill of the House No. 6969, making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 4, 5, and 9.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 8, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 3, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: Strike out the word "fifty" and insert in lieu thereof "twenty-five;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 7, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert $875,000; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 10, and agree to the same with amendments, as follows: Insert after the word "statutes," at the end of line 2, the words "as heretofore amended," and strike out the word "sixteen," in line 4, and insert in lieu thereof the word "fifteen."

WILLIAM WINDOM,
H. G. DAVIS,
R. E. WITHERS,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
J. D. C. ATKINS,
THOMAS R. COBB,
FRANK HISCOCK,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. WINDOM. I will explain this agreement if any one desires it. If not, I shall not take the time.

The report was concurred in.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills received from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Finance:

A bill (H. R. No. 6034) for the relief of the personal representatives of George W. Henderlite, deceased; and

A bill (H. R. No. 6847) to provide for the distribution of unclaimed dividends among the creditors of national banks.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 393) authorizing the Secretary of War to loan certain tents, flags, &c., to the Masons at Louisville, Kentucky, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

THE FUNDING BILL.

Mr. BAYARD. I move that the pending and all prior orders be laid aside for the purpose of proceeding to the immediate consideration of the funding bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Delaware, that the pending order, being the consideration of the Calendar of General Orders under the Anthony rule, be postponed for the purpose indicated by him.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 4592) to facilitate the refunding of the national debt, the pending question being on the amendment reported by the Committee on Finance, in section 1, line 18, after the word "three," to insert "and one-half;" so as to read:

The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to issue bonds to an amount not exceeding $400,000,000, of denominations of $50, or some multiple of that sum, which shall bear interest at the rate of 3½ per cent. per annum.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. On this question the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. FERRY. If the Senator from Connecticut will yield to me a moment, I wish to state that as a member of the Committee on Finance I desired an amendment to the bill which by a majority of the committee was deemed unwise, and I did not press it in committee. I felt a delicacy in presenting the amendment to the Senate until the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. ALLISON,] also a member of the committee, submitted an amendment. I now feel justified in submitting the amendment which I proposed in committee but did not press. It is not in order to offer the amendment now, but I give notice to the Senate that at the proper time, when the amendments of the committee shall have been acted on, I shall move, in line 18 of section 1, to strike out the word "the," before "rate," and insert "a," and in the same line, after the word "rate," to strike out "of" and insert "not exceeding;" so as to read "which shall bear interest at a rate not exceeding 3½ per cent."

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President——

Mr. WITHERS. Will the Senator from Connecticut yield to me to make an announcement?

Mr. PLATT. Yes, sir.

Mr. WITHERS. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations not to press the appropriation bills which are now in my hands for consideration to-day, hoping that we may reach a vote on the funding bill now under consideration, but I am also instructed by the committee to press them to-morrow morning to the exclusion of everything else.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President, I desire as briefly as I can to address the Senate upon the question as to the rate of interest this contemplated loan shall bear, and to give such reasons as occur to me for sustaining the report of the committee, and the rate of 3½ per cent. rather than any lower rate.

I remember once to have heard a remark which for the sound philosophy it contained, concisely expressed, seemed to me to have a right to take its place among the current proverbs of the country. It was this: "It is better to be safe than to be sorry." I think in the consideration of a question like this, the results of the decision of which may be so momentous, we may well apply that homely phrase. It is better in this matter to be safe than to be sorry hereafter.

What is the situation? What is the Government to gain by successfully funding the 5 and 6 per cent. bonds at 3½ per cent.? It is to gain a saving in the annual interest charge during the whole period of time which those bonds have now to run of $12,000,000 in each year. What is it to lose if the rate of 3 per cent. interest shall be adopted for this loan and there shall be a failure to refund it? It is certain to lose $12,000,000 for one year, because nobody will claim that any refunding bill could be passed to go into operation in less time than a year if the one now proposed shall fail. Very probably the period of time during which we shall fail to save this $12,000,000 per year will be indefinitely extended, and very probably, and almost certainly, we shall be unable at any future date to pass a funding bill which can be successfully put in operation by which we shall be able to save as much as we shall save by a bill in which the rate of interest is fixed at 3½ per cent.

It seems to me that Senators who do not agree with the recommendations of the Secretary of the Treasury, who do not agree with the recommendations of the Senate Committee on Finance, but who think they see in the present condition of affairs an opportunity to gain notoriety for this country by placing its bonds on the market at a lower rate of interest than that recommended by the committee and a lower rate of interest than that at which any government on earth has hitherto been enabled to sell its securities at par, fail to contemplate the possibility of a failure of this loan at a less rate of interest than 3½ per cent. They seem to take it for granted, notwithstanding this overwhelming weight of authority and opinion that a loan cannot be securely and certainly negotiated unless the rate of interest is as high as 3½ per cent., that it can be done at a less rate, even at a rate as low as 3 per cent. Probably in no other country on the face of the globe would there be any serious hesitation in adopting the recommendations of the minister of finance backed by the committee of the legislative department which had the matter in charge. In England, or in France, or in Germany, or in any other country whose credit is good, such recommendations would be adopted without hesitation and almost without discussion.

But here in this country it is entirely different. I know that Senators should not bind themselves to the judgment of anybody else. I do not ask that Senators shall surrender their individual opinions to the opinions of any other men; but nevertheless I cannot but deem it wise to follow the recommendations of those who have the best opportunities to know what is best in this matter, unless it is perfectly apparent beyond contradiction, beyond contingency and peradventure, that a loan can successfully be negotiated at a lower rate of interest than they recommend. For one, unless I felt absolutely certain after an examination of the whole field, if there remained in my mind the slightest doubt on the subject, I would not dare to disregard the recommendation of those who are so well qualified to speak upon this subject.

What this disposition to depart from the recommendations of the Secretary of the Treasury and the recommendations of the Committee on Finance arises from, I am unable to tell. Possibly it arises from the fact that every man deems himself the best financier in the United States individually. Possibly it arises from the universal tendency of the citizens of the United States to haggle and dicker in a trade. I believe if the present Secretary of the Treasury and the Committee on Finance had recommended the funding of this loan at 3 per cent. interest, men, I fear Senators, would have been found to say, "Let us try it at 2½; let us go lower;" and when the lowest possible rate had been named, men would be found to request that the loan should be put on the market at even a lower rate.

It seems to me that this is not wise statesmanship. I think that from the best information we can obtain we are warranted in the belief that 3½ per cent. is the lowest rate of interest at which this loan can be negotiated. Let me allude once more to the recommendations of the Secretary of the Treasury. What object has he to deceive in this matter? He has no glory or fame to acquire in the success of this funding operation. He is to leave that Department where he has so well won his fame as a financier, and the operation of funding the debt is to be intrusted for success or failure to a new man, to a man who, however much of honest purpose and ability he may bring to the question, will certainly be to some extent untried in the business of negotiating loans; and as with the Secretary of the Treasury so with the Committee on Finance. To whom should we listen? To those men who by careful study and long experience are best capable of judging what is the wisest rate of interest to be adopted, or to the speculators of Wall street who are interested in having a rate of interest adopted at which this loan cannot be floated at par?

When I consider these questions it seems to me my plain duty, unless somebody can show me that there is no question that it can be negotiated at a lower rate of interest, to follow the suggestions of the Secretary of the Treasury and the Committee on Finance. That has not been shown. None of the 4½ per cent. or other bonds of the Government are selling at a price to-day which shows that a 3 per cent. loan can be negotiated at par. England has put an East India loan on the market at 3½ per cent. and I do not believe, much as I would like to delight myself with the picture, that the credit of this country is yet stronger and better to any appreciable extent than the credit of Great Britan.

But Senators say the Secretary was mistaken once, and the members of the Finance Committee were mistaken once; they thought that the last loan could not be funded at 4 per cent.; others said the loan could be funded at a lower rate of interest than 4 per cent., and 4 per cent. was a compromise rate, and subsequent events have developed the fact that it might have been placed then at a lower rate of interest than 4 per cent., therefore they are mistaken now. I do not think that follows. Why were they mistaken, if mistaken at all? Because they failed, as well they might fail, to foresee the unparalleled prosperity which was just in advance of them. I think Senators who now suppose that this loan can be negotiated at a lower rate of interest than 3½ per cent. will find that they are mistaken, because they fail to see that just in advance of us is a condition of things in which it will be vastly harder to fund this loan than it is at the present hour.

The advocates of a 3 per cent. interest or a 3½ per cent. interest look only, as it seems to me, at the present moment. Let me suggest to them that we are to-day riding on the top wave of a wild speculation, and that they and that others seem to lose sight of that fact and to suppose that it is but just the setting in of the tide. It is always so. Past experience must teach every cool and level-headed man that the rise in values and the enormous volume of business and speculation have reached, or nearly reached, their maximum, and that there must come, and that not very remotely, I fear, indeed, before this funding operation shall be set in motion, reverses which will bring depression, a fall in values, a fall in prices, if not panic and ruin and disaster. I know that every man who refuses to believe that we have only just commenced this upward movement of values, who fails to admit that prices are going on increasing indefinitely, is called a croaker, an alarmist; but I think we ought to take counsel of our sound judgment rather than of our rosy hopes. I think we should realize the fact that in all human probability this loan will be put upon the market under less favorable conditions for its success than exist to-day, or, at least, that the condition of the market before it shall be finally placed will be far less favorable to placing it than now.

My colleague [Mr. EATON] has expressed himself in favor of a 5-40 bond, and thinks such a bond can be negotiated at 3 per cent. because of the belief which will exist among financiers and those who will invest in such bonds that it will be impossible for the Government to pay them before maturity; in other words, that such a security would be practically a forty-year bond, and therefore would sell at as low a rate of interest as 3 per cent. per annum.

I am compelled to differ with him as to the desirability of such a bond. I hope and I believe that with wise legislation, and consequently prosperous times, with peaceful relations at home and abroad, we shall have paid the last dollar of our national debt long before the lapse of forty years. That will be an achievement of which the nation may be justly proud. That will be a well-earned glory, beside which the glory of having borrowed cheaper than any other nation will fade and be unnoticed. I cannot believe that if the Government shall find itself unable to take advantage of its option to pay the bonds to be issued as proposed in this Senate bill after five years it will have any difficulty whatever in paying them at the end of twenty years. That period will occur in the interval between 1891 and 1907, when no other bonds are falling due, a most convenient time for their payment.

This nation differs from all other nations in that its people are fully determined that its debt shall be paid to the last dollar in the shortest time compatible with a taxation which shall not be too rigorous and burdensome. In this determination and in the efforts thus far made to that end may be found one great cause of our unparalleled credit, may be found the secret of our advancing power and greatness among the nations of the earth. I cannot believe that the people of Connecticut favor any policy which looks to the continuance of any portion of the public debt beyond the earliest day practicable for its payment.

Mr. President, this question has been argued hitherto as if the only thing to be considered was at how low a rate of interest it was possible to fix and place this loan; in other words, to use the current phrase, at how low a rate of interest can this loan be "floated?" I cannot agree that this is the only consideration to be taken into account. I cannot agree that there is nothing else to be thought of except how cheaply the Government may be able to borrow its money. We want not only to float this loan, but we want that it shall stay floated, and that is more important than that we shall at first be able to place it—more important to the people, more important to the business interests of this country, more important to its future prosperity, its credit, and its greatness. The question which wise statesmanship should consider and answer is this: What rate of interest ought the Government, having in view the best interests of all the people, to pay on this loan? not what is the cheapest rate of interest which it can obtain.

I was struck with the remarks of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] the other day upon the subject, wherein he said of the question under consideration:

> That question is of significance in two ways; first, as affecting directly the Treasury of the United States in regard to the amount of the interest, and, second, as affecting the rate of interest which the people of the United States shall pay upon obligations assumed in their ordinary business transactions.

That is a thought which may well be considered in determining this question, and which should be by no means overlooked. What is to be the business rate of interest in this country? What is a fair rate of interest for the Government to pay? There is such a thing as a fair rate of interest, and there is such a thing as an unfair rate of interest; and I hold it to be just as bad in kind, if not in degree, for a government to coax or coerce people to lend it money at a rate of interest which is too low as for the money-lender to take from the borrower a rate of interest which is too high.

What is a fair rate of interest? It is certainly not the highest rate which the lender would take if he could get it. It may not be the lowest rate at which the Government can induce the lender to part with his money. What is a fair rate of interest if we consider only this day and this hour may be a very unfair rate of interest before the five years' option shall expire or before the twenty years shall expire when these bonds mature. If it be found to be an unfair rate of interest the result will be that these bonds will go below par, a disaster I think which would more than overbalance all the benefits to be derived from the saving which the Government might make in the difference between 3½ and 3 per cent. I believe that rate to be fairest and wisest and best which, during the whole period that these bonds are to remain outstanding, will maintain them at or substantially at par, always excepting times of panic, against which we cannot provide, and the coming of which we cannot certainly foretell.

Does any one who does not listen to the interested speculators of Wall street, and whose eyes are not blinded with the glamour of stock speculation, believe that a 3 per cent. bond or a 3½ per cent. bond is to remain at par in this country during the next five, ten, or twenty years? I think I may safely assume that the answer to that question must be in the negative; and I suggest to those who desire to win a cheap glory for this Government in placing this bond at a lower rate of interest than any other Government has ever been able to place its bonds, to consider the probability of these bonds at a 3 per cent. interest being at 90 or 85, and to ask themselves whether the whole country will not then point to the unwisdom of their position of to-day.

Whom does the Government desire to take this loan? We are told that it is to be a popular loan, that the people at large are to take it, that the bill has been framed especially for that purpose, that as far as possible it may be kept out of the hands of the capitalists holding it in large blocks and distributed among the thrifty, humble people of this land. If we were dealing with the money-lenders of Europe the question would be entirely different; but we are dealing with our own people; we are dealing with women, with children, with those whose property is in the hands of guardians and trustees, with the farmer who has laid aside temporarily a little money, with the merchant who has a little balance which he desires to invest in a security which shall be not only absolutely safe, but which he may convert at any moment without loss. Do we want to stand—if I may use the word—jewing with this class of people to see whether this rate of interest shall be 3½ or 3¼ or 3 per cent.? We must remember that what the Government will save by cheapening the rate of interest this class of people of whom I have spoken will to a great extent lose.

I called this morning at the Census Office to look over some of the tables which have been prepared under the direction of the Superintendent of the Census, and he promised to send me some in time for use in my remarks; but they have not arrived, and I shall ask the liberty of appending them to my remarks.*

* DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, CENSUS OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., February 17, 1881.

SIR: The table issued last week by the wealth, debt, and taxation division of the census shows the amount of bonded debt of the three hundred cities and towns in the United States having a population of 7,500 and upward. The aggregate population of these cities and towns, according to this report, is 11,350,772, and the total bonded indebtedness $664,346,913, with an average per capita debt of $58.53.

This exhibit also shows the rates of interest which this immense debt draws. No less than $6,169,623 draws 10 per cent. interest; $11,000, 9 per cent.; $18,864,007, 8 per cent.; $356,500, 7½ per cent.; $16,385,560, 7$\frac{3}{10}$ per cent.; $188,265,829, 7 per cent.; $1,551,104, 6½ per cent.; $304,206,158, or nearly half the amount of this debt, 6 per cent. interest; $515,000, 5½ per cent.; $98,642,017, 5 per cent.; $4,688,150, 4½ per cent.; $21,458,835, 4 per cent.; $983,000 of the forced southern loan draws 3 per cent.; $2,250,040 seem to be unspecified, as the rates of interest on this amount have not yet been reported to the Census Office.

It will be observed that 4, 5, 6, 7, and 8 per cent. are the predominant rates of interest.

The following table shows the proportion of the total bonded debt bearing the following rates of interest. The fact that the combined percentages do not represent the whole of the debt is readily accounted for by the fact that only $631,000,000 is represented in the table of proportions, the other $33,000,000 drawing 7½, 9, and 10 per cent. interest.

Proportion of the total bonded debt bearing following rates of interest.

|---|---|
| 8 per cent | 0.03 |
| 7 per cent | 0.28 |
| 6 per cent | 0.46 |
| 5 per cent | 0.13 |
| 4 per cent | 0.03 |
| Total | 0.95 |

Referring to the tables showing the distribution of registered bonds, I have the honor to say that the total amount of 4, 4½, and 5 per cent. bonds at the date of this investigation was $992,822,550, distributed as shown in Table A. Mr. Hatch, of Fisk & Hatch, and other persons who deal largely in bonds, inform me that it is safe to estimate the distribution of the coupon bonds at about the same ratio as the registered bonds, allowing, however, from 10 to 15 per cent. more coupon bonds for the large cities, as the very nature of the registered bonds makes them a better investment for those who desire permanency.

There were at the date of the inquiry into distribution of the registered bonds about $474,717,400 coupon bonds which, if distributed at the same ratio as the registered bonds, not allowing for the extra amount of coupon bonds owned in the cities, would be as follows:

Coupon bonds.

|---|---|
| Eastern States | $80,701,958 00 |
| Middle States | 315,687,071 00 |
| Western States | 62,187,979 40 |
| Southern States | 16,140,391 60 |
| Total | 474,717,400 00 |

You can readily find the popular distribution of both coupon and registered bonds, at least approximately, by adding the above to the amount of registered bonds held in different sections of the country. Trusting this hurriedly-prepared data will be of service,

I have the honor to be, your obedient servant,

ROBERT P. PORTER,
Special Agent.

Hon. ORVILLE H. PLATT, United States Senate.

The tables referred to are as follows:

TABLE A.

| | | |
|---|---|---|
| Four per cent. registered bonds: | | |
| Individuals | $271,435,900 | |
| Banks and trust companies | 113,306,900 | |
| National banks | 136,526,700 | |
| Foreign holders | 6,831,450 | |
| | | $528,100,950 |
| Four-and-a-half per cent. registered bonds: | | |
| Individuals | 72,010,900 | |
| Banks and trust companies | 53,620,400 | |
| National banks | 39,461,950 | |
| Foreign holders | 5,187,550 | |
| | | 170,280,800 |
| Total of 4 and 4½ per cent. registered bonds | | 698,381,750 |
| Five per cent. registered bonds: | | |
| Individuals | 74,092,050 | |
| Banks and trust companies | 60,524,250 | |
| National banks | 143,949,150 | |
| Foreign holders | 15,875,350 | |
| | | 294,440,800 |
| Total of 4, 4½, and 5 per cent. registered bonds | | 992,822,550 |

The following table will show the total amount of 4, 4½, and 5 per cent. bonds held in the four different sections of the country, and also the amounts held by males and females respectively, and the percentages held by each:

| | Male. | Female. | Total. | Percentage owned by males. | Percentage owned by females. | Percentage held in different sections |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| Eastern States | $50,142,500 | $20,829,550 | $70,972,050 | 70.6 | 29.4 | 17 |
| Middle States | 223,225,150 | 55,763,100 | 279,008,250 | 80 | 20 | 66.5 |
| Western States | 43,576,600 | 10,842,150 | 54,418,750 | 80 | 20 | 13.1 |
| Southern States | 10,241,250 | 2,898,550 | 13,139,800 | 77.9 | 22.1 | 3.4 |
| Total | 327,185,500 | 90,353,350 | 417,538,850 | 78.3 | 21.7 | 100 |

From these tables it will appear that of that portion of the registered bonds of the United States now held by individuals 29 per cent. in the New England States is held by women, 20 per cent. in the Middle and Western States, and 22 per cent. in the Southern States. That of course does not include those held by guardians nor by trustees nor by savings-banks, where the poor and the humble have so largely deposited their surplus earnings; but it shows this significant thing that the loan is passing out of the hands of capitalists and passing into the hands of the common people of the country, and in that fact is an element of strength of which this country ought not to be forgetful.

Before I pass from this part of the subject in relation to the inquiry what is a fair rate of interest, I will say that I expected to have from the Superintendent of the Census a table showing at what rate the bonded indebtedness of the cities of the United States amounting to nearly seven hundred million dollars is held. Some of the cities of the United States are paying as high as 10 per cent. None of them except in an exceptional instance lower than 4 per cent. The great bulk of the bonded indebtedness of the cities of the United States pays between 6 and 7 per cent. interest. Those bonds to-day, although they may be nominally taxable, are practically untaxable and untaxed.

If it be said that 3 per cent. is a fair business rate of interest, I ask Senators if they propose to invest their capital in enterprises, however safe they may be, which will return them only 3 per cent. after deducting taxes? For the purposes of this argument they may think that they will, but as a practical fact you will find them investing their money in enterprises which they think will yield 6 per cent. or 5 per cent. at least, as the lowest rate of interest, deducting taxes, which is compatible with successful business.

Who in fact is to take and hold this loan? It is said that the banks are largely to take it, and the inference is that it is no consequence at how low the rate of interest, you may compel the banks to take these bonds and be satisfied. I have no interest in national banks; I do not own a dollar of stock in a bank, and therefore I may say that I have no patience with the sentiment abroad in this country which cries "down with the national banks." We should not have a country to-day if the banking system had not been adopted and put in operation; we should not have prosperous business to-day; we should not have good times to-day, if it had not been for that wise system of banking—the wisest and the best in my judgment that exists on the face of the earth—a system which furnishes absolute security to the bill-holder. No man in this broad land ever lost one dollar upon the bills of a national bank and no man ever will.

It is said they make a great deal of money, and therefore they can afford to take these bonds at a very low rate of interest. I believe the fact is, Mr. President, that during the last five years the dividends paid by national banks upon their capital and added surplus has not exceeded upon an average 6 per cent., and those dividends are taxable in the hands of the stockholders. I ask Senators to consider this fact, that the circulation of the national banks is not as high by several millions as it was five years ago, that it has been decreased in the last six weeks. I read an extract from the speech of the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL,] yesterday:

> In the month of January, 1881, and twelve days of the month of February, $5,545,300 of the 4 per cent. bonds were withdrawn and $1,815,800 deposited. Thus in six weeks the excess of these bonds withdrawn from the Treasury and thrown upon the market was $3,729,500. The excess of 4½ per cent. bonds withdrawn during the same time was $1,467,900.

Putting those items together, there is an aggregate of the excess of bonds withdrawn from the Treasury within the last six weeks of more than five million dollars, a sum which is substantially represented, deducting 10 per cent., in the retirement of the circulation of national banks during these last six weeks. When you consider the tax upon national-bank circulation, which, it is safe to say, will not be repealed by this Congress, it is idle to suppose that the banks will take 3 per cent. bonds in place of the bonds which they now hold to the extent which they now hold them. They may not entirely refuse to take them; but they will refuse to that extent which will bring upon us a sudden and violent contraction of the circulation of this country. Let any Senator ask his conservative banking friend, as every Senator has such a friend, in whom he places implicit confidence, and he will tell him that even at 3½ per cent. interest the bonds held now by national banks will not be fully replaced by the new bonds; and the only thing which makes me satisfied with the feature of Treasury notes in this bill is the fact that I believe there must be a sudden and violent contraction of the national-bank circulation. If it were not for that fact I should regard the issue of Treasury notes as a dangerous measure, in that it would inflate suddenly the currency of the country, and then as suddenly, when interest had accumulated upon them, contract it again. It will be my hope that to some degree they may supply the place made by the retirement of the national-bank circulation under this act.

Having considered whether the banks are to take these bonds or not, who are to take the rest of them? Not the capitalists. Capitalists may hold Government bonds at 5 per cent. or at 6 per cent. and find their money in them. They are not going to take Government bonds and hold them at 3 and 3½ per cent. to any great extent. They are to be taken by the class of people of whom I have spoken; they are to constitute the little surplus which has been left to the children by the New England mechanic and the western farmer, who has laid up by steady attention to his business a little competency; and I hold it to be unfair and unjust for this Government to put a rate of interest on these bonds which shall not, during all the time which they have to run, be reasonable and fair to such people and maintain their securities at or about par.

For one, if this be a popular loan, as we hope, and if I knew that persons such as I have described could be induced to take and hold this loan at 3 per cent., I would not vote for that rate. I would rather pay 4 per cent. than 3 per cent.; and putting aside the men who desire to speculate in Government bonds and who are to-day running them up in Wall street beyond their intrinsic value, as they are non-dividend-paying stocks to the neighborhood of par, I do not believe that the business men of this country desire a loan to be placed lower than 3½ per cent., and I think they would prefer that it should be 4 per cent. rather than less than 3½. This Government, if the bond is really worth more than par at 3½ per cent., will reap its advantage in the increased premium; the Government will lose nothing; and it will thus prevent a loss falling eventually upon that class of people who are least able to bear it, to a great extent, and whom we least desire should bear the loss, if any there is to be.

But the rate of interest that is to be paid in business transactions during the next five, ten, or twenty years is to be largely affected by the rate of interest which the Government places upon this loan. I know that the Government rate of interest is not the only thing which influences the business rate of interest; but it does influence it, it does have its effect upon it. When you reduce the Government interest there follows or goes along with it a reduction in the business rate of interest. The business rate of interest is a most important factor in the future prosperity of this country. If it be too low there is danger in it as surely as if it be too high. If the rate of interest be too high, what is the result? It eats up capital, it eats up the capital invested in all business enterprises, and bankruptcy follows, hard times follow. And what if it be too low? The capitalists seek other avenues for investment, they are tempted into speculative enterprises, and they will do what they are doing to-day, put their money at risk for the sake of obtaining a higher rate of interest than the current rate. What is the result of that? Overspeculation, overtrading, followed by panic, by depression, by hard times. What this country needs, what the business of the country needs, is a stable, fair rate of interest, one which shall neither be too high nor too low; and I think in fixing the rate of this Government loan we should have in view the influence that the Government rate of interest is to have upon the business rate of interest.

Mr. President, all these considerations lead me to hope that the recommendation of the committee will be adopted; that we shall neither make the rate 3 per cent. nor 3½ per cent., nor shall we change the recommendation of the committee by saying at a rate not exceeding 3½ per cent. I think there is great force in the fact that when you are dealing with the men of Wall street, as you must to a certain extent deal with them in placing this loan, it is not wise to say to them, "We will sell our bonds at 3 per cent. if you will take them; if not, we will let you have them at 3½." I believe that the legislative branch of the Government should fix a rate at which it knows as well as it can be assured of anything that the loan will be placed, and placed quickly, and that rate should be certain, not left to the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. President, I have but imperfectly expressed the ideas which I meant to convey, and I have ventured to make these observations with great diffidence in the presence and hearing of Senators who from long study and long observation and experience are so much better qualified to discuss this subject than I am. I do not pretend to be a financier, but I have thought that the suggestions which I have tried to make, some of them at least, might claim the merit of being in accordance with common sense; and, if so, what I have said will not be an entirely unworthy contribution to this discussion.

Mr. PUGH. Mr. President, I shall occupy only five minutes in stating a few reasons for my vote on this funding bill.

Shall we authorize the refunding of all our national debt that is redeemable the present year? Shall the debt now drawing 5 and 6 per cent. interest stand as it is until we can pay it with the sinking fund and any surplus in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated? For the fiscal year 1882 the sinking fund will amount to $43,386,645; for the year 1883 to $45,122,110.80; for 1884 to $46,926,995.24; for 1885 to $48,804,075.04; for 1886 to $50,756,238.04; for 1887 to $52,786,487.56; for 1888 to $54,897,947.07; for 1889 to $57,093,864.95; for 1890 to $59,377,619.55; for 1891 to $61,752,724.33. The sum total of the sinking fund for the next ten years is $520,904,907.58. So that without any surplus revenue we can pay an average of $50,000,000 per annum from the sinking fund alone, nearly enough to extinguish the debt if it runs only ten years. If we were to leave the 5 and 6 per cent. bonds unrefunded and apply to them the $50,000,000 per annum of the sinking fund until they were extinguished, the following would be the interest result between refunding and not refunding. We would pay, if not refunded, an aggregate in interest of $232,500,000. If refunded at 3½ per cent. we would pay an aggregate in interest of $159,250,000—a saving, by refunding at 3½, of $73,250,000. If refunded at 3 per cent. the interest would be $136,500,000—the one-half per cent. making a difference in the aggregate of interest of $22,750,000. This calculation demonstrates the valuable benefits of refunding the 5 and 6 per cent. bonds redeemable the present year at 3 or 3½ per cent. interest, whether we desire to pay them sooner or later.

Deciding, then, that it is best to refund as a business transaction, upon what terms shall it be done or proposed? The principal and most troublesome question is, what shall be the rate of interest, and one-half of 1 per cent. is the subject of controversy. No one proposes less than 3 or more than 3½ per cent. Either rate is an unprecedented and most gratifying rise in national credit and fall in interest in the short period of ten years—nearly 100 per cent. Nothing is more cautious and cowardly than capital. It never approaches where there is the least suspicion of danger. No class in the world is wider awake to all the perils of capital than its owners. The paramount consideration with them is the unsuspected safety of the corpus of their wealth. They never care so much for more or less interest as they do for the undisturbed repose secured alone by the conviction of perfect safety. No sense is so painful and persistent in its annoyance as the sense of insecurity of capital and its investment. Hence the preference for safe long bonds even at the lowest interest. It is to secure the freedom from uneasiness that comes from the satisfaction of the perfect safety of what they have already accumulated. Look at the unknown millions in Europe and America hoarded in utter idleness, satisfied with the unproductive safety of the money chest. Show these capitalists the iron casemates of United States bonds, and they will run into them immediately without inquiry as to how much interest they are to get in addition to the consideration of safety to their capital.

No country in the world's history ever exhibited to timid, cautious capital so many and such undeniable and reliable evidences of undoubted and everlasting security of the principal and interest of capital and of its freedom from incumbrance or disturbance of its investment in its obligations as is now furnished by this country and its Government. No country in the world is as free from all the possibilities of irrepressible conflicts, dangerous antagonisms, or disruption. No country or government in the world stands upon as firm or reliable peace basis, or is as well established in the confidence and affection of its own people or in the confidence and friendship of foreign nations. In almost a single decade it has extinguished a thousand million dollars of its national debt and made the most rapid strides in wealth, power, prosperity, and progress. Its securities are exempt from taxation, and take the place of specie as the basis of the safest currency and the most profitable banking system in the world.

How is it in Europe? Burdened by a national debt, all the time on the increase, with no prospect of diminution; with vast standing armies and expensive royal establishments; widespread and deep-seated discontent among its populations, forming dangerous elements of irrepressible conflict and possible revolution; rival nations in close proximity, and full of jealousy and ambition, the existence of many of them dependent upon the present distribution and the preservation of the balance of power in Europe; with no securities free from taxation, none that supply the basis of banking and currency. For these reasons I am fully persuaded that time and circumstances, the existence and relation of things, can never be more favorable for the establishment by our Government of 3 per cent. as its normal rate of interest. The other questions of time, &c., arising on the bill are comparatively immaterial, and I forbear to delay action by any further remarks. I am indifferent about the time these bonds have to mature, if the Government has the option to pay them when it has the money, without increasing the burdens of the people.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President, it was not my purpose until a few hours ago to take part in this debate. It has been, and still is, my intention to assist in making as good a funding bill as possible, with as much benefit and as little evil to the people in it as can be procured in such a measure. Whether I shall finally vote for it or not will depend upon its condition when a vote is reached upon its passage, after all amendments have been considered. A low rate of interest on bonds of brief duration, with no discrimination in favor of national banks, will, in my judgment, make the best funding law attainable.

The amendment offered by the Senator from Texas, [Mr. COKE,] together with some things which have fallen from other Senators, have induced me to change my purpose of remaining silent. The amendment of the Senator from Texas relates to a subject of great importance to the American people. Its object, if I understand it correctly, is to protect the greenback currency now in circulation from possible destruction under the operations of the pending bill. With that object, it is perhaps needless for me to say, I deeply and earnestly sympathize, and I embrace the opportunity presented by that wholesome amendment to express my views of its propriety and necessity.

Sir, it is now something more than a year since a needless, uncalled-for, and alarming financial agitation sprang up, instigated by associated bankers and capitalists, in favor of the wholesale destruction of the entire legal-tender note or greenback currency of this country. The systematic efforts made in the same interest to force a resumption of specie payments on a gold basis alone are fresh in the minds of all. By the act of 1873 silver was destroyed as money, and by the act of 1875 provision was made for the retirement and destruction of legal-tender notes until they were contracted within the reach of a gold basis for the purposes of redemption. This policy was the most baneful and truly infernal one ever inflicted upon the people of this country. The memory of it starts afresh the curses of its victims. It destroyed all values both of property and labor. It bankrupted millions of honest people, deprived laboring men and women of a chance to earn bread, drove thousands and tens of thousands to vice and crime, filled the prisons with despairing inmates, and stained the earth with the blood of suicide and murder. This is the true record of the years between 1873 and 1878. The patience of the people at last gave way. They turned upon this accursed policy of destroying money, the measure of all values, and broke it down. The year 1878 is one long to be remembered by the laboring people of this country. In that year they gained the only victories they have had on the financial question since the republican party came into power, nearly twenty years ago. On the 28th day of February, 1878, the Congress of the United States, by an overwhelming vote over the veto of the President, restored the old American silver dollar to coinage and circulation.

The struggle here was protracted and determined. The advocates of the gold basis, the monometallists, the adherents of silver demonetization, filled the country with predictions of the evils which would flow from its restoration. No act of Congress, however, has ever given greater satisfaction to the masses, irrespective of party, their only regret being that it did not go far enough; that it did not place the coinage of silver on the same free and unlimited basis with gold. In my judgment, this defect of the law will be cured at no distant day. But the work of financial reform in 1878 did not stop with the restoration of silver money. By the act of May 31, 1878, the further destruction and contraction of greenbacks was prohibited. They were recognized by this legislation as a permanent part of our currency. They were no longer left to the caprice or interested motives of their enemies. The business world took notice of this fact and their credit rose at once. Under the apprehension of being compelled to do so by law, the Secretary of the Treasury agreed to receive them in payment of customs duties on imports, and they immediately took their place in the money markets at par with gold. On this fact is based the claim that specie payments have been resumed. I am glad to know that the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] looks upon this claim of specie resumption as I do, for it is a pleasure to concur with him whenever I can. In the opening sentences of his speech of January 27, 1880, he says there is no actual resumption of specie payments at this time, and, after describing the present law on that subject, he declares that "to resume by such a delusive process is as idle as to bail water with a sieve."

It would be difficult, indeed, to describe more forcibly a foolish effort to do an impossible thing. That Senator, I am sure, will therefore agree with me that the revival of business throughout the country is not in any respect due to the so-called resumption of specie payments, when in point of fact such a resumption has not taken place at all. In my judgment the legislation of 1878, legalizing silver money and protecting the greenback currency from further destruction and consequent contraction, did more than all other causes combined to restore confidence in business circles and to bring about whatever degree of prosperity we have since enjoyed. We have had bountiful harvests, it is true, but without financial stability and without confidence in the quality and amount of money regulated by law, no favorable change would have occurred. The President of the United States, however, at the opening of Congress in December, 1879, and again at the opening of the present session, asked us to undo all we have done on this great subject. In his annual message of December last he strongly urges Congress to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to suspend the coinage of the silver dollar of 412½ grains; and then with daring hardihood he recommends the retirement from circulation of the entire volume of legal-tender notes, commonly called greenbacks.

Sir, this is a tremendous issue. It is the boldest attempt at outrage on the people, as it seems to me, in the whole range of our financial history. It is not equaled even by the act of March, 1869; for while that act plunders the tax-payers of hundreds of millions they never agreed to pay, yet its grasp at power was not so great as we are now confronted with. This demand upon us to destroy at one fell blow nearly three hundred and fifty millions of the debt-paying money now in use comes as that of the President, but it is not merely his. It is the demand of more than two thousand national banks organized as the National Bank Association, that Congress shall abandon to them the absolute control of every feature of our financial system. The President in his message simply speaks for them when he attempts to excite distrust against United States notes made by law a legal tender. It is evident they think no money should reach the people except through their own agency. If the greenback currency was swept from existence the banks would have the financial field to themselves, and their currency with its profits to them and its expense to the people would soon fill the place of that which had disappeared. This is the vast stake for which the money power now plays. It involves not only millions, but power. It involves the abdication by Congress of all its powers over the currency and the surrender of the whole subject to a moneyed autocracy before which every interest and every department of this Government will be powerless.

Such corporation wealth and far-reaching financial dominion as that to which the National Banking Association now aspires have hardly a parallel in the history of the world. Is it not time to look to the terms and the principles of the Constitution? In whose hands does that instrument place the power to create a circulating medium for the use of the people? We constantly hear about the duty of driving the financial question out of Congress. To read from day to day the organs of the banks it would appear to be an usurpation on the part of Congress to consider the question at all. From them it would appear that the Federal Government was entirely incompetent to endow its paper currency with debt-paying functions. Such, too, I understand to be the position of the able chairman of the Finance Committee of this body.

Let us examine briefly and see whether the founders of this Government did in fact fetter its hands and cripple its powers to the extent claimed. In all governments among men sovereign power is lodged somewhere. There is always a place beyond which you can go no farther. In the words of William Pitt, in the House of Commons, in 1799, "In every government there must reside somewhere a supreme, absolute, and unlimited authority." Sovereignty is rightfully claimed on some subjects by the States of this Union, and with equal justice by the Federal Government on other subjects. Each has a limited sphere of sovereignty beyond which it cannot go. Each has prescribed bounds, and there must stop. But with the people, back of all Federal and State governments, is lodged the supreme, absolute, and unlimited authority from which emanate all constitutions, laws, and policies. They can bind and they can loosen. They made the government of the States, and they made the Federal Government. Chief-Justice Marshall, the master mind of American jurisprudence, in deciding the case of McCulloch vs. The State of Maryland, says:

> The Government of the Union, then, (whatever may be the influence of this fact on the case,) is emphatically and truly a government of the people. In form and in substance it emanates from them. Its powers are granted by them, and are to be exercised directly on them and for their benefit.

The great purposes for which the people created the Government of the Union are also specifically declared. In the decision just cited Chief-Justice Marshall again says:

> The Government proceeds directly from the people, is ordained and established in the name of the people, and is declared to be ordained in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity.

With these purposes in view—purposes as beneficent, as vast, far-reaching, and glorious as ever sustained the hopes of the human race—did the framers of that sacred instrument, the Constitution, make a close and narrow limitation of the means by which to carry them out? We have heard much, throughout all our history, of strict constructionists of the Constitution. I hope and believe that I belong to that party. I am in favor, however, of strictly construing the Constitution for the accomplishment of the great and declared ends of Government, rather than for their defeat. I believe the power to carry out and establish these ends is vested by the Constitution in the Government of the United States. By the last clause of section 8 of the first article of the Constitution it is declared that Congress shall have power—

> To make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any Department or officer thereof.

That is a broad and sweeping provision, and it has been held to bestow a wide discretion upon Congress in the selection of the necessary and proper means with which to execute the powers of the Government and to fulfill the purposes of its creation. The decision of the present Supreme Court of the United States, in 12 Wallace, holding the laws creating legal-tender notes to be constitutional on the ground that such a currency was necessary for the preservation of the Government, has been harshly criticised. The Senator from Delaware, in his speech of more than a year ago, saw proper to say:

> Nor do I care now to recite the sad history of the overthrow of one of the most deliberate decisions ever reached by the Supreme Court, accomplished so speedily by the active interference and power of President Grant and Mr. Hoar, his Attorney-General, by the change not in the opinion but in the personnel of the tribunal, and an increase in its numbers.
> On May 1, 1871, this decision was overruled by the reconstructed court by a vote of 5 to 4, and their judgment is to be found in the twelfth volume of Wallace's Reports.

Sir, the Senator might have spared the Supreme Court his grave censure. Every principle of law as to the power of Congress found in 12 Wallace, upholding the constitutionality of the legal-tender acts of 1862 and 1863, is to be found in 4 Wheaton, in the case of McCulloch vs. The State of Maryland, enunciated by Chief-Justice Marshall in 1819, now more than sixty years ago.

All there is of the question of power is stated on page 421 of 4 Wheaton:

> We admit—
> Says Chief-Justice Marshall—
> as all must admit, that the powers of the Government are limited, and that its limits are not to be transcended. But we think the sound construction of the Constitution must allow to the National Legislature that discretion, with respect to the means by which the powers it confers are to be carried into execution, which will enable that body to perform the high duties assigned to it in the manner most beneficial to the people. Let the end be legitimate, let it be within the scope of the Constitution, and all means which are appropriate, which are plainly adapted to that end, which are not prohibited, but consist with the letter and spirit of the Constitution, are constitutional.

Under the doctrine here laid down, the issue of legal-tender notes in 1862 and 1863 was left by the Constitution to the discretion of Congress, to be decided by that body in view of all the facts then before it. This ruling indeed makes the power of Congress depend on a question of fact.

The Government in 1862 and 1863 was striving to maintain its own existence. Was that end legitimate and within the scope of the Constitution? It had to support great armies in the field and equip fleets on the ocean to insure self-preservation. Was the legal-tender note currency an appropriate means of assistance for that purpose? Was it adapted to the service it was expected to perform? Was it a necessary and proper means to a legitimate end? If so, it was a constitutional currency unless prohibited by the letter or the spirit of the Constitution. It is not pretended that such a prohibition exists in terms. Is it prohibited by the spirit of the Constitution or by any implication arising out of any of its provisions? We are all familiar with the argument on this point. Because the Constitution gives to Congress the power "to coin money and regulate the value thereof and of foreign coins" it is insisted that the power to make money out of anything that cannot be actually coined is excluded. But those who take this position and urge a technical construction cannot themselves adhere to the term "coin" without giving it an explanation which does not appear in the Constitution. The Constitution does not speak of the coinage of gold or silver. All kinds of metals may be coined. Iron, zinc, lead, and all other metallic substances might be used to comply with the mere verbal phrase of the Constitution. Nor does the Constitution expressly authorize Congress to declare any kind of money, even gold and silver, a legal tender. These facts show that in order to restrict the term "coin" to the precious metals, instead of allowing it to apply to all metals, and in order to give Congress the power to declare them a legal tender, we have to go outside of the express words of the Constitution to obtain its meaning.

Nobody questions that so far as the coinage of metal money is concerned no other substances except gold and silver can be coined, and yet the Constitution does not say so. Nobody questions that Congress can make gold and silver a legal tender, and yet the Constitution is silent on that point. If, therefore, so much of the power of Congress over the question of money, on points where there has never been any dispute, is derived from inferences arising out of the Constitution, rather than from expressions to be found in it, might we not with safety apply the same rule to the matter that is in controversy? I do not believe that the power of Congress is exhausted by the mere coinage of metallic money. Let it be understood that all money is created by law, and that all power to declare what shall be money is vested in Congress. The Supreme Court of the United States says:

> If the power to declare what is money is not in Congress, it is annihilated.

It is expressly taken away from the States. Section 10 of the first article of the Constitution provides that—

> No State shall enter into any treaty, alliance, or confederation; grant letters of marque and reprisal; coin money; emit bills of credit; make anything but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts; pass any bill of attainder, ex post facto law, or law impairing the obligation of contracts, or grant any title of nobility.

This is a sweeping prohibition of the exercise of power by the States. It is a total negative, and taken in connection with the affirmative grant of power on this subject, it demonstrates the original purpose to confer upon Congress a full and complete power over the currency of the people. There is one feature in this prohibitory clause of the Constitution more suggestive than any other. The power to make anything but gold and silver a legal tender in payment of debts is expressly denied to the States, but not to Congress. The subject was before the minds of the framers of the Constitution; they considered it; and the fact that they denied to the States, in express words, the power to make paper money a legal tender, and were totally silent as to the power of Congress on that subject, is a strong implication in favor of that power in Congress. This implication is greatly strengthened, too, when we reflect that the power of Congress to make gold and silver a legal tender in payment of debts is also an implied power, and not an express grant. If it was the intention of the framers of the Constitution that Congress should not have the power to make anything but the precious metals a legal tender, how easily, how certainly, how inevitably would they have inserted such a provision when they were treating of that very question! Would they have used express language in order to deprive the States of this power, while Congress, to whom every vestige of power over money was transferred, was left untrammeled, unless it was their design to permit Congress a discretion on the subject? If it is said that this is a Government of delegated powers, and that while the power to make anything but gold and silver a legal-tender was prohibited to the States, yet it was not delegated to the United States, the answer is, that neither was the power to make gold and silver a legal tender expressly delegated to the United States. So that if by reason of its full general control of the question of money Congress derives a power, unexpressed in the Constitution, to declare what shall be a legal tender in the payment of debts, what is there to confine it merely to the precious metals? On this point the reasoning of the Supreme Court, to my mind, is just and unanswerable. It is found on page 546 of 12 Wallace, and is as follows:

Why, then, it may be asked, if the design was to prohibit to the new Government, as well as to the States, that general power over the currency which the States had when the Constitution was framed, was such denial not expressly extended to the new Government as it was to the States? In view of this it might be argued with much force that when it is considered in what brief and comprehensive terms the Constitution speaks, how sensible its framers must have been that emergencies might arise when the precious metals (then more scarce than now) might prove inadequate to the necessities of the Government, and the demands of the people; when it is remembered that paper money was almost exclusively in use in the States as the medium of exchange, and when the great evil sought to be remedied was the want of uniformity in the current value of money, it might be argued, we say, that the gift of power to coin money and regulate the value thereof was understood as conveying general power over the currency, the power which had belonged to the States and which they surrendered. Such a construction, it might be said, would be in close analogy to the mode of construing other substantive powers granted to Congress. They have never been construed literally, and the Government could not exist if they were. Thus the power to carry on war is conferred by the power to declare war. The whole system of the transportation of the mails is built upon the power to establish post-offices and post-roads. The power to regulate commerce has also been extended far beyond the letter of the grant. Even the advocates of a strict literary construction of the phrase "to coin money and regulate the value thereof," while insisting that it defines the material to be coined as metal, are compelled to concede to Congress large discretion in all other particulars. The Constitution does not ordain what metals may be coined, or prescribe that the legal value of the metals when coined shall correspond at all with their intrinsic value in the market, nor does it even affirm that Congress may declare anything to be a legal tender for the payment of debts. Confessedly the power to regulate the value of money coined, and of foreign coins, is not exhausted by the first regulation. More than once in our history has the regulation been changed without any denial of the power of Congress to change it, and it seems to have been left to Congress to determine alike what metal shall be coined, its purity, and how far its statutory value as money shall correspond from time to time with the market value of the same metal as bullion. How, then, can the grant of a power to coin money and regulate its value, made in terms so liberal and unrestrained, coupled also with a denial to the States of all power over the currency, be regarded as implied prohibition to Congress against declaring Treasury notes a legal tender, if such declaration is appropriate and adapted to carrying into execution the admitted powers of the Government?

But it has been strenuously insisted on this floor that the obligation of contracts was impaired by the passage of the legal-tender acts, as they are known, of 1862 and 1863. Even if this position could be sustained, it is not clear that it would render them unconstitutional. The States are prohibited from making any "law impairing the obligation of contracts." Is that true, however, as to Congress? We do not find it so in the language of the Constitution; neither do we find it in the practices of the Government. What is a general bankrupt law except a provision by which contracts may not only be impaired but abrogated, totally destroyed? A bankrupt law applies to all contracts, past and future, and provides legal methods for their entire obliteration. It may be said that the power is expressly granted in the fourth clause of section 8, article 1 of the Constitution to enact a general bankrupt law. That is true, but if Congress is prohibited from impairing, under any circumstances, the validity of contracts, how can two such antagonistic principles stand together in the same instrument? Congress can declare war, before whose blasts contracts are withered and blown away. Congress can pass non-intercourse acts, and enforce embargoes by which contracts may be hindered, impaired, and annulled. But I am very far from admitting that the legal-tender acts do impair the obligation of contracts, whatever the power of Congress may be on that subject. The argument on this point, however, can of course apply only to contracts made prior to February, 1862. All contracts made since the passage of the first legal-tender act have been made with reference to the existence of the legal-tender-note currency.

The complaint in regard to contracts prior to February, 1862, is that a man who owed a debt at that time might afterward pay it in legal-tender notes, or greenbacks, as they are popularly styled, and that his creditor had to take them. Was this an impairment of an ordinary contract to pay money, in which there was no mention of any special kind of money, and in the discharge of which both parties simply contemplated the use of the lawful money of the country? I say it was not. Numerous decisions of the Supreme Court of our own country, and of the highest courts of all other civilized countries, might be cited to show that "the obligation of a contract to pay money is to pay that which the law shall recognize as money when the payment is to be made." Every contract is made subject to the power of the Government to enact new laws and to repeal old ones. All human conduct is governed by the same rule. We all take the risk of not only what the law now is, but of what it hereafter may be. This is a risk which every citizen shares at every step and on every conceivable subject. The legal-tender acts are not the only financial hazards the American people have encountered in the way of a change of laws. The acts of Congress regulating the coinage of gold and silver have been repeatedly altered and amended. The number of grains of gold in the gold eagle was reduced 6 per cent. in 1834, without changing its legal-tender value. The same thing has been done more than once with silver coin, and it has never been contended that such legislation impaired the obligation of contracts. The position assumed by the Supreme Court on this point is the only one which can be upheld. It is stated on page 548 of 19 Wallace, as follows:

It is true that under the acts a debtor, who became such before they were passed, may discharge his debt with the notes authorized by them, and the creditor is compellable to receive such notes in discharge of his claim. But whether the obligation of the contract is thereby weakened can be determined only after considering what was the contract obligation. It was not a duty to pay gold, or silver, or the kind of money recognized by law at the time when the contract was made, nor was it a duty to pay money of equal intrinsic value in the market. (We speak now of contracts to pay money generally, not contracts to pay some specifically defined species of money.) The expectation of the creditor and the anticipation of the debtor may have been that the contract would be discharged by the payment of coined metals, but neither the expectation of one party to the contract respecting its fruits nor the anticipation of the other constitutes its obligation. There is a well-recognized distinction between the expectation of the parties to a contract and the duty imposed by it. (Speden vs. Austin, 5 Adolphus and Ellis, N. S., 671; Dunn vs. Sayles, Ibid., 685; Coffin vs. Landis, 10 Wright, 426.) Were it not so, the expectation of results would be always equivalent to a binding engagement that they should follow. But the obligation of a contract to pay money is to pay that which the law shall recognize as money when the payment is to be made. If there is anything settled by decision it is this, and we do not understand it to be controverted. (Davies, 28; Barrington vs. Potter, Dyer 81, b. fol. 67; Faw vs. Marsteller, 2 Cranch, 29.) No one ever doubted that a debt of $1,000 contracted before 1834 could be paid by one hundred eagles coined after that year, though they contained no more gold than ninety-four eagles such as were coined when the contract was made; and this, not because of the intrinsic value of the coin, but because of its legal value. The eagles coined after 1834 were not money until they were authorized by law; and had they been coined before without a law fixing their legal value, they could no more have paid a debt than uncoined bullion, or cotton, or wheat. Every contract for the payment of money simply is necessarily subject to the constitutional power of the Government over the currency, whatever that power may be, and the obligation of the parties is therefore assumed with reference to that power.

In the discussion of this great question, however, we have always heard much stress laid on what have been termed the "war powers" of the Constitution. There are those who, while admitting that Congress has the power to make legal-tender notes, still insist that such power only exists during war. They hold that a state of war gives rise to a power in the Constitution, and confers it upon Congress, over the currency of the country, which has no existence in time of peace. It is certainly true that great war powers belong to this Government. But is the power on the part of Congress to create a legal-tender note circulation for the people one of them? That is the plain question. The powers of Congress on the subject of war are specifically named in the Constitution. It may be profitable to read them.

To declare war, grant letters of marque and reprisal, and make rules concerning captures on land and water;

To raise and support armies, but no appropriation of money to that use shall be for a longer term than two years;

To provide and maintain a navy;

To make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces;

To provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections and repel invasions;

To provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States, reserving to the States, respectively, the appointment of the officers, and the authority of training the militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress.

Sir, if the power of Congress, or any part of it, over the currency is derived from the grants of the Constitution in relation to war, it must be found somewhere in the clauses which I have just read. They contain all the power which has been given to Congress on the subject of war. Those who contend that the legal-tender notes are constitutional in war, but not in peace, claim that their argument is sustained by the two clauses just quoted:

To raise and support armies, but no appropriation of money to that use shall be for a longer term than two years.

To provide and maintain a navy.

They contend that the power to raise and support armies and to provide and maintain a navy implies the power to resort to an issue of legal-tender notes if necessary. It is clear to my mind that in these clauses the framers of the Constitution were providing a power in Congress for the appropriation of money for the support of our military and naval forces rather than for a power to create money to be appropriated. The same sentence which provides for raising and supporting armies treats of appropriations of money for that purpose, and limits the time for which they may be made. The thought connected with that clause of the Constitution at the time it was written, so far as money was concerned, evidently dwelt on the power to appropriate money from the Treasury and not upon the power of Congress to declare what should be the money of the country. The truth is that the power of Congress over the currency is far broader than all the war powers of the Constitution combined. War is not the chief pursuit of this Government, nor of any other, except a government of savages. War is not the only condition in which the American people may need financial relief. Peace may have its financial emergencies as well as war. Peace, the friend of industry, the promoter of trade, the builder of cities, the patron saint of commerce; peace, the best gift of God to nations and to men; why should it have less power in the Constitution with which to execute the purposes of the Government than war? Why should the long reign of peace be less able to preserve the Government and to promote the general welfare than the brief periods of strife and bloodshed?

Sir, Chief-Justice Marshall did not speak of a time of war or a time of peace, but for all times and for all conditions of public affairs, when he said that—

The sound construction of the Constitution must allow to the National Legislature that discretion with respect to the means by which the powers it confers are to be carried into execution, which will enable that body to perform the high duties assigned to it in the manner most beneficial to the people.

This principle here laid down by the mighty mind of Marshall recognizes in Congress, in the immediate representatives of the people, the power, without respect to a condition of peace or war, to adopt such measures as in their judgment are best calculated to promote the general welfare, provided simply that the measures adopted are not prohibited by the Constitution and are consistent with its letter and its spirit. I think I have shown that the power to make paper currency a legal tender in payment of debts is not prohibited to Congress by the Constitution, neither by the letter nor by the spirit of that instrument. No conclusion of law was ever plainer to me than that such a power exists at all times, subject to be exercised by Congress in its wisdom and in its discretion. The necessity for the exercise of the power is left wholly with Congress. Chief-Justice Marshall, in McCulloch vs. The State of Maryland, again says:

> But where the law is not prohibited, and is really calculated to effect any of the objects intrusted to the Government, to undertake here to inquire into the degree of its necessity would be to pass the line which circumscribes the judicial department and to tread on legislative ground. This court disclaims all pretensions to such a power.

It is a satisfaction to know that the Supreme Court in making its decision on this subject, in twelfth Wallace, made no claim that the power of Congress to authorize legal-tender notes was derived in any respect from the war powers of the Constitution. All concede that it is a power not to be exercised needlessly; neither is any other power of Congress to be exerted without reason. But of the occasion when the public good or the safety of the Government calls for its exercise the Congress itself is the judge, subject only to the limitations heretofore stated. I cannot refrain from quoting the reasoning of one of the concurring justices on this point. It is found on page 567 of twelfth Wallace, in the following language:

> It follows as another corollary from the views which I have expressed that the power to make Treasury notes a legal tender, while a mere incidental one to that of issuing the notes themselves, and to one of the forms of borrowing money, is, nevertheless, a power not to be resorted to except upon extraordinary and pressing occasions, such as war or other public exigencies of great gravity and importance, and should be no longer exerted than all the circumstances of the case demand. I do not say that it is a war power, or that it is only to be called into exercise in time of war, for other public exigencies may arise in the history of a nation which may make it expedient and imperative to exercise it. But of the occasion when, and of the time how long it shall be exercised and in force, it is for the legislative department of the Government to judge. Feeling sensibly the judgments and wishes of the people that department cannot long (if it is proper to suppose that within its sphere it ever can) misunderstand the business interests and just rights of the community.

If I am to be reminded at this point, as I have been heretofore, and as some sort of answer to my argument, that I voted when a member of the other branch of Congress against the first act creating legal-tender notes it will cause me no embarrassment to make reply. In 1862 this question was wholly new to every mind in this country. An experiment in the issue of currency was about to be tried, the appropriateness of which to the purposes in view was involved in a wide field of conjecture. Without the time or opportunity to examine the subject which I have since had, and with a very short experience in legislation, I voted, not that the power was denied to Congress, but against its exercise at that time. May I not revise my opinion as others have done? Chief-Justice Chase, an upright and a very able man, recommended, while Secretary of the Treasury, in letters of January 22 and 29, 1862, to the Committee of Ways and Means the passage of the law making our present greenback or legal-tender note currency. On the Supreme Bench he held that law to be unconstitutional. In dissenting from the opinion of the court, in 12 Wallace, 576, he refers to this fact. Speaking of the opinion he gave to the committee in favor of the act, and speaking of himself as Secretary of the Treasury in the third person, he says:

> It was under these circumstances that he expressed the opinion, when called upon by the Committee of Ways and Means, that it was necessary; and he was not sorry to find it sustained by the decisions of respected courts, not unanimous, indeed, nor without contrary decisions of State courts equally respectable. Examination and reflection under more propitious circumstances have satisfied him that this opinion was erroneous, and he does not hesitate to declare it.

If the late Chief-Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States could afford thus from the bench to declare the most important act of his official life an error as to constitutional law, may I not be permitted to say, in his language, that "examination and reflection under more propitious circumstances have satisfied" me that the better vote to have given in February, 1862, would have been in favor of the legal-tender act, and not against it? The currency authorized by the acts of 1862 and 1863 proved a more staunch, reliable, and powerful money than either its friends or foes expected. No one could have foreseen the success that attended it. It fed and clothed the soldiers and sailors in the field and at sea and their families at home. It preserved the Union of these States as that Union exists to-day. And since the advent of peace it has blessed every hour of the last fifteen years with its useful adaptation to the wants of the people. All this is more easily comprehended now, looking back through the strong light of experience, than it was eighteen years ago, looking forward into the darkness of the future.

I might also lean for support at this point on the authority of another name, as renowned for financial wisdom perhaps as any this country has produced, from Alexander Hamilton to the present day. R. M. T. Hunter, while a Senator from Virginia, was chairman of the Finance Committee of this body during the long period of nineteen years, and during that time he won the confidence of the financial world as a wise and prudent statesman. In a letter published in October, 1879, over his name, and in speaking of a United States note-currency, he wrote as follows:

> But it is said the Government has no constitutional right to make it a legal tender. Without this feature, it would circulate readily. But why not exercise this right? The Supreme Court has decided that Congress possesses the power. I know that objections have been raised to the manner in which the court was constituted which gave that decision. Indeed, I myself once thought that Congress had no such power, and so spoke and voted. But I believe I was in error, in common with a large portion of the community. Subsequent reflection has convinced me of that error, and I hasten to acknowledge it.

The Constitution has declared that no State shall make anything but gold and silver a legal tender. But it has not extended this prohibition to Congress, which is allowed to enact all laws necessary and proper to carry out the granted powers. Is it not necessary to enable the Congress to regulate commerce between the States that it should have the right to declare something else but gold and silver a legal tender? If these metals alone are a legal tender, or if there is no legal tender, all contracts must be settled on specie, at the pleasure of the creditor; and, as there is not specie enough in the country to do this easily and conveniently, the commerce of the country and the country itself are placed in the power of the holders of the specie. Trade and production may be stopped and have often been stopped to a great extent at their will. To start these again, debtors must exchange their property for small amounts of specie. This is a condition which those who hold the specie will surely require hereafter as heretofore. If, then, it is manifest that without some legal tender other than gold and silver the holders of specie will rule the commerce of the country, and as a consequence the country itself, the property of the debtor class will be placed at the mercy of the creditor class. Is it not manifest, too, that the entire production of the country will be at the pleasure of those same holders of the precious metal? Then it follows that it is necessary for the proper regulation of commerce that a legal tender should be made of some such notes as I have described; for, that being done, the credit of the United States would enable it to issue a currency which would prevent all these ruinous effects.

But, sir, aside from the constitutional power of Congress to make this kind of currency a legal tender, it is now vehemently insisted in certain quarters that its legal-tender quality has been from the first injurious to the best interests of the country. It is absolutely urged that the power to pay debts with this currency, standing firmly the equal of gold if not better, is a great and dangerous evil to the people. It is in daily use at this hour in all the transactions of life, from the most minute to the most extensive, from the purchase of a night's lodgings to the purchase of a railroad, or a line of ships. It is now transacting the business of every neighborhood, every village, and every city in the United States. It has been the basis of all contracts among the people for the last eighteen years. It is the measure now, at this very moment of time, of the obligation of parties to nine hundred and ninety-nine contracts out of every thousand in existence. Yet we are asked to believe that the legal-tender quality of this money, that quality which enables a party to pay a debt contracted with reference to it, is injurious to the public interests, and ought at once to be withdrawn. It has even been claimed that the money would be better without such quality, and that it would still circulate, with increased vigor and usefulness, after it had received the fatal blow aimed at it by its enemies.

As well might you expect a man to walk erect through this Hall after his heart had been taken from his body. The Senator from Delaware, on a former occasion, in strong, figurative language, said, "This assumed legal-tender power is like the germ of a deadly fever." He said he would destroy that germ without delay. Rather is the legal-tender power of our currency like the benignant action of the human heart, carrying a healthy and an indispensable circulation to the remotest extremities. The people of that great State—the fifth in wealth and population in the galaxy of thirty-eight—which I have the honor in part to represent in this body do not want this life-giving power taken from the money now in use in their hands. I speak for them, and I assume to speak for nobody else. Every page of history, and all the teachings of experience and reason prove, if anything can be proven in advance of its occurrence, that the destruction of the legal-tender quality of the greenback currency would be followed by such a paralysis in trade, such a prostration of confidence, such confusion, and such a financial panic as have rarely, if ever, taken place in any quarter of the civilized globe. The morning after the enactment of a law to that effect the farmer would find the ten-dollar note which was good the day before shorn of all its strength and powerless to pay a debt. All classes engaged in active business would find that in a single night something worse than a killing frost had stolen into their homes, and nipped with a deadly blight the root of their present prosperity. The people, the plain, laboring people, from ocean to ocean, would not know where to turn for relief against their obligations. Am I to be told that by virtue of what is called specie resumption the holder of a greenback note can obtain coin money for it, and therefore he will not be injured by the destruction of its debt-paying power? Where can the farmer or the mechanic or any one else living in Indiana, or in any of the other States, get coin money for the legal-tender note which he will find withered and dead in his pocket?

Proclamation has been made of a place in the city of New York, and perhaps in other far-distant cities, where such an exchange can be accomplished. A person holding fifty dollars and upward and living perhaps a thousand miles or more from the place designated for redemption has the right to demand coin upon presentation at that place. And this is the provision on which the greenback is to rely for credit in all the far-extending transactions of life after its legal-tender power has been demolished! What a mockery! What a snare! Sir, I do not for a moment doubt the sincerity of any Senator on this floor; but whatever may be said here it is not the intention of the prime movers against the debt-paying quality of our legal-tender-note currency that it shall long survive. It is intended by them that this currency of the people shall perish. It has been determined, to use the language of Mr. Stevens, in "the caverns of bullion brokers and in the salons of the associated banks," to destroy it from the face of the earth. That is the real meaning of this movement. The New York Times, speaking on this subject with as much authority from the interest-income classes as any other of their organs, revealed their true object in the following statement made in reference to the resolution of the Senator from Delaware of January, 1880:

> This would be a decided step in advance, though its principal value would lie in the probability, amounting to almost a certainty, that the notes would then be gradually withdrawn. They would at any rate cease to be money in the legal sense of the term. They could not be used to pay debts without the consent of the creditor. * * * They would be sent to the Treasury for what they were worth, and not being legal tender for dues from the Government, they would tend to disappear, and this would be a very great advantage.

The same paper, in further allusion to the resolution of the Senator from Delaware, said that it was—

> But a partial solution of the vexed problem of the currency, and that it would be valuable chiefly as leading to a solution more radical and permanent, that of the retirement and cancellation of the notes.

Much more might be cited of a similar character from other powerful sources, proving conclusively the genuine motives which inspired this unexpected and startling attack upon our present system of currency. Indeed, the Senator from Delaware himself, with characteristic frankness and courage, avowed his purpose to stop the reissue of the legal-tender notes when they have once been returned to the Treasury, thus insuring their cancellation and destruction as fast as that Department can obtain possession of them. This he deemed necessary in order "to bring about an actual resumption of specie payments." I am not opposed to an actual resumption of specie payments, whenever I can be satisfied that such a policy will best promote the public welfare. I am wedded to no mere theory of finance which will not yield to a sense of the public interests; but I see no good end to be attained through the destruction of three hundred and forty-six millions of money now fully equal to gold in value and performing every useful purpose ever performed by the best money in the world.

Sir, I might pause here a few moments to contemplate a strange feature in the history of the times in which we live, and through which we have passed. The extreme and unceasing denunciation of the legal-tender note currency extending from year to year without abatement or intermission has filled me with amazement, although the selfish and interested motives were all the time apparent. It has seemed most remarkable that a currency with such a history should be held up with envenomed rancor to the scorn of the world. If, instead of having performed services to the country beyond the reach of estimate, it had infected the American people with all the crimes from larceny to high treason, and with every disease from common malaria to yellow fever, it could not have been assailed with more fury than we have heard poured out against it. The ancient hue and cry in England after a fleeing blood-stained felon, was a mild display of passion compared to the blind, unreasoning hostility of the national-bank system and its adherents toward the greenback money. Every adjective of contempt and hatred in the English language has been applied to it. There has been no epithet too coarse, vulgar, or brutal to describe it. Men of apparent intelligence and fairness, on other subjects, have vied with each other in the invention of new and sensational phrases with which to load it with ridicule. They have ransacked dictionaries to be sure that they had overlooked no term of derision or abuse with which to bring it into public odium. The fact that this money paid the soldier for his life as he lay dead on the field; that it has paid many who survived for the agony of amputation, and for carrying their maimed bodies on crutches through life; that it has been received, oh! how gratefully, by the widows and orphans of the war for the loss of husbands and fathers—such facts as these give no respectability even to the greenback in the estimation of its sordid, avaricious enemies. It is with them dishonest money, with no palliating circumstances. They have made the country ring for years with their stereotyped cry of "dishonest money." Having enriched themselves by depreciating it at the start, and purchasing the bonds of the Government with it in that depreciated condition, they have been engaged ever since in trying to spurn it away for fear they would have to take it in payment of something due them on their bonds. Would it not be marvelous, indeed, if the fruits of such a course of conduct did not grow and ripen in some shape or other in the public mind? The soldier himself has at last been taught by the enemies of the greenback currency the full measure of his injustice. You pay the bondholder in gold, and you pay the soldier in what you yourselves style "dishonest money."

Why should you gape and wonder that he who left his home behind, marched, toiled forward to the battle-field, fought by day and watched by night for one year, or four years, thinks himself entitled to as good money in pay as the man who staid in the rear, purchased bonds at fifty cents on the dollar, and is now receiving, by a legislative violation of the contract, a premium on their face in gold? If there are those here who voted for the act of March, 1869, changing the law for the payment of the national debt so as to make it a coin debt, and who have joined in characterizing the greenback as dishonest money, they are the real authors of the soldiers' petitions which some time ago poured by every mail into this Capitol. They have taught a lesson which is coming back to plague them. They wrought an offense to every soldier in the Union by preferring the bondholder above him in making payment for the suppression of the rebellion. The response has been coming in from more than a million and a half of soldiers who survived the war. They simply ask to be remunerated for their perils and sufferings to the same extent as those who risked nothing except their speculative investments. Do you wonder at it? I leave to others the task of disputing their claim or gainsaying the justice of their appeal. Let those who have raised the storm by open and flagrant injustice quell it if they can.

Sir, I shall in a few moments take leave of this great question for the present. I have detained the Senate longer than I desired, but as a member of the Committee on Finance I have conceived it my duty to submit the reasons which govern my action. Let no one suppose that the financial question will disturb us here no more. The holders of amassed capital are grasping for additional power, and this question will come again and again as long as human cupidity can spy out new fields of profit to occupy, and new bounties and still further special privileges to demand from the labor of the people. A vast money corporation, the most gigantic on earth, is aiming to centralize within itself all the powers of this Government over the currency, and consequently over the entire trade and business of the American people. That corporation, the National Bank Association, possesses already a combination of powers inconsistent with the safety of free government, and we have seen it within the past year clutch at all the remaining powers connected with the subject of the finances. The holders of privileged capital are also uttering their battle-cry for the future. Their demand for a strong government is now heard on every hand. No one need mistake their meaning. A strong government, in their estimation, is one in which the people are deprived as far as possible, and the farther the better, of all power to control public affairs. A call for a strong government today in our midst has the same meaning it has had in all the ages of the past—a government of the privileged few. Sir, I too am in favor of a strong government, but the strength which I wish my government to have is to be found only in the hearts of a free, self-governing people, inspired with a love of country because of its just and equal laws. On such a foundation no government can be overthrown; on any other, no government ought to stand.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I desire only a moment to state the reasons why I am in favor of the rate of 3½ per cent. and an objection that I have to another portion of the bill, not with a view, however, of defining my action finally on the bill. I shall very briefly give the reason why I disagree with many of my associates on the subject of declaring in the bill the amount of interest that shall be paid upon the bonds. There are many different views entertained on this proposition. Some are in favor of 3 per cent., others are in favor of 3½ per cent., and others are in favor of making a sliding scale, providing that the rates shall not exceed 3½ per cent.

Without going into any elaborate argument, I will state that I am in favor of 3½ per cent. on the bonds, as fixed in the bill, for the reason that I believe it is as low a rate as we can float this amount of bonds at this time. I think it ought to be very gratifying to us that we at least have reason to believe that we can do this. My reason, however, for not agreeing to the proposition to give to the Secretary of the Treasury the right to sell these bonds at not exceeding 3½ per cent. is, if you put a provision in the bill that the interest shall not exceed the rate of 3½ per cent., the Secretary of the Treasury will attempt as a matter of course to sell the bonds to persons who desire to purchase them at a less rate of interest. A combination would be formed, which is very easily done, so as to prevent the sale of these bonds at a less rate of interest than 3½ per cent. Why? Because it will easily be seen that finally they will get them with a rate of interest at 3½ per cent. When that is done a great many persons will at once say that the Secretary of the Treasury has acted dishonestly; that he could have put these bonds before the country and sold them probably at 3 per cent., and that it has been merely a speculation that the sale at 3 per cent. was prevented. Hence my judgment is that it is best to fix in the bill the rate of interest for which the Secretary of the Treasury shall be entitled to sell the bonds. I will be very glad if we can sell our bonds at this rate; it will be a saving of many millions of interest.

Mr. FERRY. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. FERRY. I hope the Senator will then support the amendment which I propose to offer to provide as to the $400,000,000, as well as the $300,000,000, that the rate of interest shall be left to the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, not exceeding 3½ per cent., giving him the option to place the bonds in open market as the condition of the money market may be. I propose to offer such an amendment.

Mr. LOGAN. No; the Senator misunderstood me. I disagree with that amendment. I say my judgment is that the rate of interest should be fixed so that the Secretary of the Treasury will not have an option for the reason, as I said, if he does he will finally float these bonds at the highest rate of interest fixed in the law, and combinations will force him to do it. I am not saying that I would object to a rate of interest being fixed lower than 3½ per cent. if it is best, but whatever the rate of interest is, it ought to be fixed and certain so as not to embarrass the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. FERRY. The Senator has not lost sight of the fact that when that discretion was left to the present Secretary of the Treasury to place bonds at 4½ per cent. and at 4 per cent. he withheld the four-and-a-half percents and placed them at 4; and that also Secretary Chase, when the discretion was left to him to place loans not higher than 6 per cent. placed them at 5?

Mr. LOGAN. I understand that perfectly. There is a great difference, however, between 6 per cent., 4 per cent., 4½ per cent., and 3½ per cent. bonds. I am speaking of the probability that there is now of floating this amount of indebtedness of the Government. As I said, I think we ought to be very well satisfied if we can float this amount at the rate of interest proposed by the Committee on Finance. If those who have an opportunity of knowing or forming correct opinions believed that we could float this indebtedness at a less rate of interest, as a matter of course I would agree to it, and so would everybody; but that information is of such a character that I am satisfied with the report of the committee on this point.

The objection to this bill is, first, I do not believe it is wise or good policy to make two classes of indebtedness, one of which is called a 3½ per cent. bond and the other called a Treasury note drawing 3½ per cent. interest. I think that is not wise, and that the better policy would be to make all of one class; it should all be a bond and I will give my reasons for that. I do not propose to go into details because I only wish to put on record my views in general terms. Not that I desire to put anything in the way of the passage of the bill but to give my reasons for my objections and my reasons for being in favor of that portion of it which I have mentioned.

We have doubtless as much current money at this time as the business of the country requires. To-day the business of this country is not complaining on account of a scarcity of money. If we issue these Treasury notes, $300,000,000 in addition to the present circulation, drawing 3½ per cent., or not to exceed that amount, for they may be issued at a less rate of interest; I do not, however, think they will; this issue will throw upon the country $300,000,000, or whatever amount of them may be issued as Treasury notes, or I might say currency, as they will at first go into circulation.

It is not denominated currency, it is denominated "Treasury notes," drawing interest payable in one year or redeemable in ten, giving the option to the Government of one year or ten years. It is to my mind perfectly certain that these notes, particularly of the smaller denominations, will go into the hands of the people as currency. Then what will be the result? They are sold at par; every person will take them; they will float as currency. As the interest upon these notes accumulates the banking interest of the country will gather them in, and at the end of six months, when the interest has accumulated on the notes, the banks will have the notes, and to that extent they will be gathered in, thus contracting the currency. When that interest is paid the notes will at once go out again among the people, and increase the volume of currency to that extent, so that we shall have every six months a contraction and every six months an expansion. That will be the result. It will be like the waves which roll up and recede; and it is my judgment that these $300,000,000 of Treasury notes, as proposed, is one of the greatest inflation measures yet presented to Congress.

I am opposed to that. I am opposed to inflating the currency except just as the natural business interests of the country require and demand its expansion and contraction according to the business wants of the people. These Treasury notes, or whatever you may term them, will for a while float as currency, and will produce both inflation and contraction as the interest accumulates or decreases.

That portion of the bill I dislike. I do not think that business in the healthy condition it is now in this country desires an inflation or contraction, as this bill will force and bring about. I do not think it will continue a healthy condition, but more likely an unhealthy condition of the business interests of the country.

However, as I said, I merely desired to give my opinion; I shall not stand out and try to defeat a measure which is deemed a wise one. I shall not try to defeat it, for the reason that I think the times demand a bill of some kind for refunding the portion of the public debt soon to be redeemable. For that reason I acquiesce in it if it cannot be changed, but at the proper time I shall move—I do not know that anybody will agree with me—to make under this bill one entire issue; that is, that all this indebtedness shall be of one character of bonded indebtedness. That will fail, probably; and if it fails, I then would fix the rate of interest on these Treasury notes not at 3½ per cent., for if these notes will be used as currency they will go at 3 per cent. just as well as it will at 3½.

I would make that distinction between this portion of the bill and that portion which applies to the bonds. For the bonds I think the rate of interest at 3½ per cent. is probably correct, and as low as we can float the $400,000,000, and perhaps we shall not require that much; but when it comes to Treasury notes going before this country at 3½ per cent., the same rate as the bonds, I say that is not wisdom in my judgment. I notice that they are to be in denominations of $10 and up to $1,000, and to tell me that a $10 Treasury note will not pass in this country drawing 3 per cent. interest, redeemable in twelve months, is simply to me incomprehensible.

Mr. FERRY. Will the Senator allow me to make a suggestion, as I want to get at what is best on this question? The Senator, as I understand him, suggests as his judgment that all this loan should be in the form of a bond.

Mr. LOGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. FERRY. Now I ask him, as forty-odd millions are required for the sinking fund each year, if he places this all in a bond redeemable after five years and not payable until twenty years, how does he provide for the Government making provision for the sinking fund unless he compels the Government to go into the market and pay a high premium for the bonds?

Mr. LOGAN. I am not on the Finance Committee and had no hand in making this bill, and I am not going into a discussion with the Senator in reference to the sinking fund.

Mr. FERRY. We are sorry the Senator is not on the committee.

Mr. LOGAN. When it comes to providing for the sinking fund, the Senator understands perfectly well that it is the simplest process in the world to do that. There is no difficulty on that point. We are not of necessity required to float $300,000,000 of Treasury notes at 3½ per cent. to provide for the sinking fund. There is no such necessity as that upon the country, and the Senator well knows it.

Mr. FERRY. I know the Senator would not misrepresent my views in that respect. The requirements of the sinking fund for five years would be only about two hundred million dollars.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well.

Mr. FERRY. And the Treasury notes, as provided for in this bill, are issued for that purpose, reserving after one year the right to the Government to retire them and in that way supply the 1 per cent. upon the public debt required for the sinking fund. The point the Senator made was that this loan should all be put in the form of bonds. If so, they must be under the bill redeemable in five years and payable in twenty years or some longer time. By that course, for the five years you shut the Government off from the right or the privilege of taking up the bonds for the sinking fund. There is the difficulty that I perceive; and I ask the Senator for an explanation.

Mr. LOGAN. I will ask the Senator how do you provide for the sinking fund now suppose this bill does not pass?

Mr. FERRY. We provide that after the first year these notes shall be redeemable and the Government can give notice and retire them.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well.

Mr. FERRY. But if the Senator proposes to put them all in the form of bonds redeemable after five years, how can he compel holders or investors in these bonds to surrender them until they are redeemable or payable?

Mr. LOGAN. We all understand that the Government would have to buy in the market, or provide in some other way as we do now.

Mr. FERRY. That comes to the point I stated in the first question I put to the Senator. It compels the Government, then, to enter into competition and pay a high premium on these bonds for the sinking fund, which is guarded against by these Treasury notes redeemable after one year.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator says it is guarded against by these Treasury notes. If the Government has to enter into competition and these Treasury notes are placed at 3 per cent. interest, is it going to cost the Government any more to buy them if they are at 3 per cent. than if they are at 3½ per cent.?

Mr. FERRY. That is not the point.

Mr. LOGAN. What is the point?

Mr. FERRY. If the Senator succeeds in his proposition of having the loan wholly upon a bond basis, in that form you cannot compel the holders of the bonds to surrender them if they are not redeemable. There are two parties to the bargain, the holders and the seller—being the Government.

Mr. LOGAN. That is perfectly simple. We all understand that there is no contract without two parties.

Mr. FERRY. Now I say without these notes the Government must enter into the market and bid up for the bonds in order to compel their retirement.

Mr. LOGAN. There is no difficulty about providing for the sinking fund. As I said I did not intend to enter into a long debate or to make a long argument, but merely to give my reasons for objecting to a portion of this bill. I could go further and give my views about how to provide for the sinking fund, for it can be done without any difficulty whatever, and make all these securities bonds. It is very easy to put in a provision for the sinking fund. You may retain a portion of these bonds for that purpose if desired. There is no difficulty on the score of providing for the sinking fund; we heretofore provided for it without difficulty and can now do it, without a grand scheme of inflation.

My trouble is to know why it is that you undertake to float $300,000,000 of Treasury notes—pretending to be bonds and yet you call them Treasury notes—and allow them to be floated at 3½ per cent. interest in denominations running from $10 up to $1,000, which makes them a currency—nothing more, nothing less.

Mr. FERRY. The Senator will see that the committee have in view the probability of using the surplus money of the Government, to avail itself of the favorable condition of money affairs to float these $300,000,000 from one to ten years, at a less rate than 3½ per cent. The discretion is given to the Secretary of the Treasury, giving him the maximum of 3½, and still the belief of many is that these notes will be placed at much less than that.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well. The belief of many is that it will be placed at much less than that. There can be no doubt that it can be placed at 3 per cent. if it is to circulate as money, as it will just as the demand notes did. That is all they are, mere notes of the Treasury payable in twelve months, drawing a certain rate of interest. The idea that the silver certificates circulate, and that a Treasury note payable in twelve months, drawing a rate of interest, will not circulate at par, is in my judgment very absurd.

Mr. McPHERSON. Even at 1 per cent.

Mr. LOGAN. As I said I did not desire to discuss the bill at any length, but to give the reasons why in my judgment this bill should be changed either to make the issue all bonds, or if you have both the bond and the Treasury note, let the bond rate at 3½ per cent. and the Treasury note 3 per cent.

As I said I am opposed to inflating the currency except in the manner in which the natural process goes on according to the expansion of our commerce and our business. I am for keeping our money on a solid and sound basis. I am not for raising the prices of everything all over the country to an extravagant rate, as in my judgment this would do. We see the effect of the very prospect of it. We see stocks in the market to-day, some of them at 124, paying but small dividends; others going up to 150 and 160. I do not think it is a wise proposition, but at the same time that I put my views on record I do not wish to stand in the way of a funding scheme which will save to this Government the amount of millions of dollars that we shall have to pay unless we do refund our debt at a lower rate of interest.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, so much has been said upon this question that the Senate is doubtless fatigued with the discussion, and they could not patiently hear further speeches of any great length. It is not my purpose, therefore, to enter into a general discussion of the questions involved in the issue now before us. I am unwilling, however, to cast my vote without stating a few of the reasons which control my judgment in the premises.

As has already been said by other Senators, we have paid off a large part of the public debt incurred by the war within the last ten years; and while the taxes of our people have been heavy they have not been such as to prevent us from moving forward to a high tide of prosperity. The country as a whole has probably at no time been more prosperous than it now is. Within the last twenty years the area of production, or the increase in the acreage of cultivation, has been enormous. Our population has increased at a rapid rate, and it has already reached over fifty millions. We have a vast territory of unsurpassed fertility. The American people are a hardy, laborious people, full of energy and enterprise, ambitious for success, and determined to accumulate wealth. During the last few years our principal crops have been about doubled in quantity, and our facilities for transportation have been so largely increased that all our productions of every character, to say nothing of our manufactured articles, find a ready market either at home or in foreign ports. Not many years ago corn was a very common fuel in parts of the West during the winter season where wood was scarce, and wheat and pork and other productions of the country found scarcely any market, leaving the people on the fertile plains of the West, without market, with but little to stimulate their energy or enterprise, content to make enough produce to live upon, and to remain at home and enjoy it. Now we have some ninety thousand miles of railroad in operation, penetrating every section of the country that has been settled by our people, and pressing forward into the uncultivated wilderness, leading and inducing population to follow. This state of things, together with the wars and oppressions of some of the European governments, has brought to our shores a largely increased number of immigrants, each of whom finds a home in a rich country, where by labor he can soon make himself and his family comfortable.

A few years ago our exchanges were conducted almost entirely upon the cotton and tobacco crops of the South. Now the grain crop and the meat crop of the West enter very largely into the account. Why? Because the markets of the world are now open to these productions, which can be sent over long lines of railroad at low rates to the coast and then rapidly transported across the ocean upon steamships. The result has been that the last few years have shown an enormous balance of trade in our favor, which has poured a stream of gold into the United States from other countries to pay the balance due to us resulting from the usual interchange of commodities. This stream of gold and the large amounts that are made at home and taken from our mines is seeking investment. Large sums have fallen into the hands of capitalists of great wealth, many of whom do not desire to risk their fortunes upon speculation or upon the chances of an active business, and they naturally seek, even at a low rate of interest, first-class investments that are perfectly safe and free from taxation.

Not only is this true of the capitalists of large means, who invest heavily in the securities of the United States, but it is also true of a vast number of our best citizens and laboring people, who are making something to invest, and who desire to place it where it will be secure. And a bond on the United States, perfectly secure, if it is not taxable, which pays 3 per cent. interest, is a better investment for even a small capitalist than he finds in most of the channels into which he can put his capital. I think I may venture to say that a large proportion of the farmers of the United States, after they have paid all the expenses attending the production of their crops, and all the taxes assessed by the Government of the United States, the governments of the States, and of the counties where they reside, do not make clear more than 3 per cent. upon the capital invested. The same is true of a large proportion of the holders of real estate in our villages, towns, and cities. Real estate, when in the hands of men who manage well, where it is well located and properly improved, pays a better per cent.

But in every city, town, or village in the Union it would be found that much of the real estate is unimproved, and the owners are paying tax upon it without income. And of the improved real estate there is a large proportion that is not in the best location or under the best management, that does not pay 3 per cent. after all expenses of repairs, insurance, and State, county, and municipal taxation have been paid. Nor do I believe that the whole capital invested in railroads or in mining in this country has paid 3 per cent. net to the owners. Some railroads and some mines have paid largely; but I speak of the average, of the whole sum invested. And our people in this condition are beginning to calculate and properly to estimate their true situation. Hence it is that whenever the bonds of the United States have been offered, as on a late occasion, to the populace, they have taken them readily at the ruling prices even as low as 4 per cent. when our bonds brought no such premium as they now bring. And I have no hesitancy in saying that if this loan is offered to the people of the United States, and is placed within their reach in the different cities and larger towns all over the Union for as much as thirty days after having been advertised, that the country will be astonished at the amount that will be taken by citizens of small means, who desire to lay by something that they can calculate upon as positively certain, and that is absolutely free from the demands of the tax gatherer.

Senators doubt whether we can place bonds redeemable after five years at the option of the Government, but which the Government is not under obligation to redeem until the end of twenty years, usually called five-twenties, upon the market successfully at 3 per cent. I do not entertain any doubt on this subject. Fifteen years ago if the United States wanted to borrow money they had to pay 6 per cent. Then came a loan of 5 per cent., that was readily taken; and a loan at 4½, and then a 4 per cent. bond, and now the 4 per cent. bonds are selling in the market at 113 to 114. This shows the increased confidence of our people in our public securities, and their increased ability to purchase them. And the immense increase in the productions and the manufactures of the country, and the vast increase in the balance of trade in our favor, have placed in the hands of our people the means to gratify their disposition to invest in the bonds of their Government at a rate which, while it seems low, pays them a better income with absolute certainty than they can find elsewhere.

Reference has been made to the English consols, which at 3 per cent. have been most of the time a little under par. Yet it is admitted that within the last few years they have reached par. It is said, however, that this is on account of the long term they have to run, or, rather, on account of the fact that they run perpetually; and the owner is simply entitled to his 3 per cent. interest on the investment. That, with a certain class of wealthy men who desire to invest, is in their favor, and causes them to bear a better price. But another large class who would rather see the end of the loan occasionally, and know a particular day in the future, when they can demand, not what may be the market price of the consol, but the par value of it, would prefer that it should have some fixed period to run.

But there is another reason why United States bonds are naturally worth more in the market than British consols. The incomes from consols are taxable; our bonds are absolutely free from taxation. Again, this Government has a territory immensely larger and more productive than the British Government possesses. I do not speak now of the British colonies, many of which, when you deduct the expense of their wars, are not very remunerative to the mother country; but I speak of the domain that properly belongs to the British Government, and constitutes its home territory. There is not, therefore, room with them for the great expansion that we have in this country. There is nothing like so large a population in the British Isles as we have here. And while, on account of the fact that the country is much older, there has been a larger accumulation of wealth in proportion to numbers, there is no reasonable prospect that the wealth of that country will remain, as now, in excess of the wealth of this country in proportion to numbers.

But there is still another significant fact. The British Government, with all its strength and its naval power, is all the time engaged in war with somebody, which compels it to maintain large armies and navies. Those wars are expensive, and it cannot be denied that in the British Islands there is a growing discontent with the government.

At this very time the Irish question is one of great difficulty, and no one can say that the inhabitants of the British Islands may not be cutting each other's throats within the next six months. The tenants and peasantry everywhere in the islands are becoming restless at the present land laws and the present high rents they have to pay. This restlessness is also permeating the laboring masses in the iron and coal mines and the manufacturing districts; and stable and powerful as the British Government has been for a long while, its prospects for future peace, prosperity, and stability are not, probably, as great as those of the United States. Its old land system and its aristocracy are in danger. We have passed through our internal struggle. It is not at all probable that we shall have another such struggle within a century or probably centuries to come. All patriots unite in the hope that we may never have another. Our country, then, with a well established government, and with resources unequaled by any other country, offers to the world assurances of peace, prosperity, stability, and ability to pay, that neither the British Government nor any other government offers.

We feel that we have an exemption from future foreign wars possessed by few other governments. Prior to the late war between the States, this Government was considered by the leading governments of Europe as a second-class power in a military point of view. But our own struggle developed on each side immense strength, gallantry, and skill. The southern confederacy, notwithstanding the great disadvantages under which it labored, brought into the field its half a million of gallant men. The Northern States after a long struggle of four years brought into the field an army of sufficient power to crush the confederate armies and dictate terms of peace. We have now laid down our past differences. The two armies and the two sections are now united, and in case of a foreign war the troops who fought under opposing banners in the late struggle would rally together, as a united force, grand and invincible, under the old flag of the Union. Our Government, with all its sections and all the States again cordially united, can put 5,000,000 men into the field if the exigencies should require it. And while we lack a navy, and on that account might be exposed to temporary inconvenience in case of a foreign war with a naval power, still the final result could not be doubtful. It is not the interest of any foreign power to attack us with our present united strength, nor is it our disposition unjustly to attack any other power. Therefore we have a freedom from war and the expenses of large armies and navies for a long period to come, which it is not likely Great Britain or any other of the great powers will enjoy. We naturally have a right, therefore, to expect, these points being all understood, that capitalists and persons generally who seek investment would pay a little higher price for United States bonds than they would for the securities of any other government.

In view of our vast territory, our great population, our immense resources, our unbounded facilities for transportation, our rapidly increasing crops, our growing manufactures, our limitless mineral wealth, the growth of our educational, moral and religious institutions, our freedom from prospective wars, the heavy balance of trade in our favor, and for other reasons that I might assign, but which I will not weary the Senate by giving at present, I shall vote for a 3 per cent. bond, redeemable at any time after five years and payable at the end of twenty. And I do not entertain the slightest doubt that the bonds can be negotiated in the market and disposed of at par without any difficulty.

One word about another point connected with the bill before I take my seat. On pages 3 and 4 I find the following language:

> And the expense of preparing, issuing, advertising, and disposing of the bonds and Treasury notes authorized to be issued shall not exceed one-half of 1 per cent.

What is the meaning of this, and what is the amount here given? It means that this one-half of 1 per cent. upon the whole amount is to be given or used for the preparation and negotiation of the bonds. In other words it means that we are to pay for the printing, executing, advertising, and disposing of the bonds one-half of 1 per cent. The House of Representatives fixed it at one-fourth of 1 per cent.; but the Finance Committee of the Senate has thought proper to change it to one-half of 1 per cent., and we were told by the honorable chairman of the committee, on day before yesterday, in substance, that he would not desire to take the responsibility of possibly defeating the loan by refusing to pay as much as one-half of 1 per cent. for negotiating it; and he called upon Senators to know whether they would desire to incur such responsibility. For one, I have no hesitation in responding that I will with pleasure take the responsibility of voting to pay a smaller sum for that service. What is the sum we propose to pay? The whole issue of bonds and Treasury notes which are interest-bearing, which it is proposed to put upon the market, amounts to $700,000,000. One-half of 1 per cent. for preparing and negotiating the bonds is to be paid on this whole amount. What is it? The snug little sum of $3,500,000. Now, I will be pardoned for expressing the belief that it will not cost half a million to pay for engraving, printing, issuing, and advertising these securities. Then what do we pay the other three millions for? For disposing of the bonds? In other words, we give that amount as a bonus; or, in steamship phrase, which has been so often used here within the last few days, we give it as a subsidy to a certain syndicate of bankers for the trouble of negotiating this loan for us.

Now, if I were not a Senator, I should like very much to take this contract, and guarantee the negotiation of the whole loan at par. And rather than miss the contract I might be willing to pay out of this bonus or subsidy, if it becomes necessary, to the national democratic executive committee or to the national republican executive committee, whichever may be in power, and have the right to expect it, the sum of a million of dollars to aid in conducting the campaign in 1884, if party exigencies should require it. And I should feel then that I had made the handsome sum of about two millions for my trouble. And if I could not succeed with the present syndicate, with $700,000,000 of United States securities under my control, I could readily form one with which I would succeed. And if my syndicate, after the populace had been served, should have the good fortune to take a large proportion of the bonds, I should not entertain any doubt that within the next twelve months we would make more than another one-half of 1 per cent. in premiums upon the bonds so taken.

But we are warned by Senators that if we should offer a 3 per cent. bond and the negotiations should fail, and we were unable to dispose of it at par, we should lose within the next year $12,000,000 in interest, being the difference between the rate we are now paying on the bonds and the rate of 3½ per cent. And this is held over us, probably not as a rod, but as a strong reason why we should issue a 3½ per cent. bond instead of a 3 per cent. But there is another side to this picture. Suppose we should issue a 3½ per cent. bond, when we could readily sell a 3 per cent. bond, what would this cost us? It would be an addition of three and a half millions per annum to the interest we would pay on the new loan. If the bond is a 5-20 we would be obliged to pay interest on it at this rate for five years. That would amount to $17,500,000. And if we could not at the end of the five years exercise the option given to the Government, and redeem the bond for another five years, it would add $17,500,000 more to the burdens of the people. In other words, in the event we should issue a 3½ per cent. bond, when we could negotiate a 3 per cent. bond, we would pay out of the taxes raised from the people $35,000,000 more interest in ten years than we would pay upon the 3 per cent. loan. And there would be no way of getting rid of $17,500,000 of this amount, and we would be obliged to pay it. Therefore the chances for loss to the Treasury are greater if we issue a 3½ per cent. bond than if we issue a 3 per cent. bond. In the one case we might possibly lose $12,000,000 of interest; in the other case we would lose $17,500,000 of interest; and if the bonds should run ten years we would lose $35,000,000 in interest. Taking into the account the chances in favor of the negotiation of a 3 per cent. loan, the prospects for loss are much greater in the event we determine to issue a 3½ per cent bond.

But it is intimated that the credit of the Government would suffer in that case. Why so? It would simply show that we had not been able to do that which other nations have not been able to do—float at par a 3 per cent. bond. But how would this injure our credit? Would it make our four percents now in the market less valuable? The only effect would be that we must continue to pay the present rate of interest on the bonds until another loan is offered to the country at a rate that could be negotiated.

But I am so thoroughly satisfied that there will be no difficulty about the negotiation of a 3 per cent. loan that I shall, as already stated, not hesitate to cast my vote in favor of 3 per cent. We have no right to tax the labor of this country or the property of this country to pay the capitalists or anybody else a higher rate of interest than the lowest rate at which the bonds of the Government can be readily negotiated.

And if we retain section 5 of the bill as it came from the House of Representatives, and compel the national banks in future to deposit the 3 per cent. bonds, and no others, as security for their issues, we will make assurance doubly sure.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, the bill for refunding nearly seven hundred millions of dollars of the national bonds soon to be subject to redemption reported by the Senator from Delaware, as chairman of the Senate Committee on Finance, together with the able explanation of the bill made by him, in my judgment, is a safe measure for the committee to report. If it has erred, it is on the side of prudence and caution in dealing with the public credit and the national currency.

I have listened with much care and thought to the able discussion of the subject by the Senator from Delaware and others, and, while I commend with the praise of my own judgment the manner in which he has dealt with the subject as chairman of the committee, I have been drawn to the conclusion that a 3 per cent. bond is a safe rate of interest, and a practicable one for refunding the national debt.

I am impressed with the opinion that the option of redemption is the only material fact connected with the duration of the bonds, and I cannot see with this option fixed at five years that it is at all material whether the ultimate period of the bond is fixed at twenty or at forty years.

If the country should at any time be in a condition to call in these bonds it will do so; and if not, they will run to their full or an indefinite period.

I am also impressed with the conviction that it is better for the country that the debt should be paid at the earliest possible day, and the Legislature of the country relieved of the embarrassment of this great interest, which in many direct and indirect ways fetters and controls Congress in the exercise of its constitutional powers of legislation.

I do not share in the doubts which have been expressed as to the future increase and development of the productive powers of the country, nor as to its capacity to handle and dispose of the debt with ease, and without serious embarrassment to the industries of the people. On this part of the argument I concur with the opinions forcibly presented by the Senators from West Virginia [Mr. HEREFORD] and New Jersey, [Mr. MCPHERSON.] It is certainly true, in my opinion, that the public credit is to some extent and in some degree dependent on the support of the associations of credit on which the commercial world depends for the exchange of the productions of labor, and which, under our business economies, have almost absolute control of the results of labor in all its various forms. But, as the aggregations of money, or the accumulations which are made by the power of taxation from the labor of a great and prosperous people, are greater by immeasurable proportions than those which are gathered from any one, or from all other possible sources, the pledge of these accumulations must always be the great object of attraction to the enterprising and sagacious men who seek to handle these pledges for their own benefit.

There is but little ground, then, to fear that so long as the public faith is kept the pledge of the public credit of a great and prosperous people will ever lose its attraction to the financiers of the commercial world. Besides the system which has been practiced by nearly all the civilized nations of the world of connecting the circulating currency and the business of banking or of holding the money of a country on deposit with the form in which the pledge of the public credit has been made; and which was happily adapted to the necessities of the country during the late civil war by the institution of national banks, which were only a form of combining the deposits representing the gross proceeds of the industrial activities with the credit of Government and creating a currency with which to float all exchanges and control all the credits of the country as the representative of its industry and its values, furnishes a power always at hand and really under the control of the Government, and outside of this the imperative interest of which is connected with and draws its life from the organization of the public credit in the form of bonds and of a funded debt.

To me it seems, Mr. President, that there is no ground for apprehension that this Government can fail to refund its debt in the shape of bonds at almost any rate it pleases, so long as it keeps its currency at a par value. Nor have I any doubt, Mr. President, of the abundant capacity of this country under a wise and prudent system of financial economy to maintain at par any amount of circulating notes or short-time interest notes which it may reasonably see fit to use. The same facts which draw to this country the great tide of immigration—its free institutions, its freedom from war, the absence of great standing armies, its isolated situation, its vast and varied industries, its wonderful production—give it confidence throughout the world and give to its pledges of the public faith with all the syndicates and the institutions of associated credit, either public or private, throughout the world both attractiveness and absolute confidence.

I have no doubt that the Government may rely with absolute confidence upon the sale of these bonds through either syndicates of the wise men who now control by their gigantic operations the exchange and the value of all the products of industry, or they may rely on their sale to the producers, to the people at large, or on both, as perhaps would be the wiser plan. In either case the suggestion of the Senator from Delaware holds equally good. The power to sell the bonds of the United States, which are firmly and justly fixed in the confidence of the world on a safer and more stable basis than the securities of any other country stand, is a corps de reserve behind all plans for sustaining the public credit, for it derives its power and its value from the fact that this confidence appeals on all the grounds of self-interest to the men throughout the world whose business it is to make great fortunes by handling these pledges of the public credit of the governments of the world, and who are the mediums through which the productive industry of the world becomes invested in the securities of the world.

For these reasons I shall vote for a 3 per cent. bond and for an option of five years. And I am indifferent, with these provisions secured as to the other features of the bill, except that I would prefer that some provisions should be added to the bill by which subscriptions for the loans should be opened in all parts of the United States, and as would secure to the people the right of obtaining parts of the loan.

To me it seems clear that the same facts which constitute the recommendations of this country and of its forms of public credit to the commercial world clearly evidence the capacity of our people to furnish the money with which to refund the entire debt; or, in other words, establishes the value of our home market for this purpose.

I am aware of the value and do not underrate the power of the great organizations of credit, of the combinations of capable and thoroughly informed financiers who, in the great centers of commerce, combine to control the public securities of the world. I appreciate their great power and their great influence under the existing forms of trade, and commerce, and banking, and the facility with which these great funding operations may be conducted through them. I am not averse to paying them a reasonable compensation for their services in this respect, and of recognizing their usefulness to the country, but I do not believe that the Government is absolutely dependent on them.

I believe that the individual resources of the people, the producers of the country, the industrial and laboring classes, may be aggregated and brought to bear by small particles to the refunding of these bonds; for it is upon the people alone and upon their investment ultimately of their earnings in these bonds that the value of all securities must ultimately rest; and of all the people of the world the people of this country are beginning to be individually the most prosperous and the most able to make investments of money.

If this opinion is correct, we have both of these classes to rely on. We have the great capitalists of the world, the laboring people of foreign nations, the capitalists of our own country, and chief above all, the industrial-producing classes of our own people, who alone, in my opinion, are capable of themselves to refund this debt.

While it may not be prudent to rely on any one of these, yet they are all sources to be considered in estimating the probabilities as to the commercial value of these bonds.

For these reasons my own judgment is led to follow that of the House committee, and while recognizing the able argument of the Senator from Delaware and others of the committee, I am led to the conclusion that Congress may with entire safety rely on the sale of these bonds at not less than par, bearing a 3 per cent. rate of interest.

I am of the opinion that 3 per cent. is an abundant rate of interest for a government bond to bear. It is as great a rate of interest as the industries of any country can bear as a lasting and permanent burden. And while we hope to and I have no doubt can extinguish our debt within a comparatively short period of time, we cannot prudently fail to remember that the possible exigencies of government may, although the possibility is remote and uncertain, require other and great loans, and the rate of interest should be adjusted on the basis of this possibility.

I shall vote for a short option of redemption of five years, and for a 3 per cent. rate of interest; and I am not averse to a reasonable confidence and discretion to the Secretary of the Treasury, nor to a reasonable compensation to those through whom these bonds may be refunded.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I recognize fully the importance of this bill. It proposes to refund a portion of the public debt of this country amounting to somewhere between $600,000,000 and $700,000,000. I believe the statement was made that the exact amount is about six hundred and thirty-seven million dollars which it is proposed to refund by the operations of the bill now before the Senate. Of that amount I think about two hundred million dollars bear the rate at present of 6 per cent., and the residue, some four hundred and thirty million dollars, a rate of interest at 5 per cent. The aggregate interest, therefore, that we are paying upon these securities which it is proposed to refund amounts to thirty-four or thirty-five million dollars. Under the provisions of this bill we propose to refund $300,000,000 of that amount in Treasury notes, bearing a rate of interest not exceeding 3½ per cent., and $400,000,000 are to be refunded in bonds bearing the same rate of interest, 3½ per cent.

If we leave out of view entirely the amount that is to be refunded in the certificates or Treasury notes and confine ourselves exclusively to the $400,000,000 that it is proposed to refund in 3½ per cent. bonds, there will be a saving by the operation of some $12,000,000 annually. If we carry the examination a little further and ascertain what will be the difference between 3 per cent. and 3½ per cent., it will be found that we will save over three million dollars annually by adopting the lower rate of interest. It is impossible to tell exactly what would be the life of these bonds; but if the average life of the bonds should be ten years, there would be a saving to the Government by adopting the 3 per cent. rate, provided the bond can be floated at that rate, of not less than $30,000,000 in ten years. It is therefore very apparent that the question as to the rate of interest is a very important question for the consideration of the Senate.

I confess this is a question which is not entirely free from embarrassment to my mind. I have not sufficient data upon which I can predicate a positive opinion that we can float a debt of $400,000,000 or of $637,000,000 at the lowest rate of interest which is now proposed, namely, 3 per cent. We cannot determine that question by reference to the public loans of other countries, because the rate of interest in every country depends largely upon the amount of money seeking investment in the country, and in part upon the openings for investments. We cannot tell from the rate of interest of British consols or of any other securities of a foreign country what might be the fate of our own securities bearing a like rate of interest, because the conditions of the two countries are very distinct. We must therefore rely upon something else. We must look around in our own country and see if the conditions here are favorable or unfavorable to floating the debt at 3 per cent. While I have, as I say, some doubts as to the possibility of floating a 3 per cent. bond, I believe the probabilities are that we may do it.

Let us look at our resources. We have heard this morning from the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN] and also from the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] of the resources and unbounded prosperity of the country. These are facts of which we all have knowledge. Perhaps no people were ever in a more prosperous condition than the people of this country at the present day. We cannot say assuredly that that degree of prosperity will last. That depends largely upon the productive industry of the country, and in the second place upon the foreign demand for our products. I discard entirely the view that our financial legislation in the passage of the resumption act or any of the financial measures of the Government have had much to do with the present prosperity of the country. It has resulted from the bountiful harvests with which we have been blessed and the foreign demand for our surplus products. That has brought us prosperity more than any and all other causes combined. If that condition of affairs continues there can be in my judgment no question about the ability of the people of this country to absorb all this $637,000,000 even at the lowest rate of interest proposed.

In addition to that, I want to mention a further fact. This is to be a mere substitution for existing loans. When you put out $637,000,000 it is but to replace existing loans, and will furnish opportunities for investment for that amount which is already invested in the securities of the Government. What becomes of the $637,000,000 which are already invested in the securities of the Government unless it goes into these new bonds? Will the holders of that money put it on deposit in the banks and receive no interest, or will they seek for securities upon real estate or in some other way invest it so as to produce a larger amount of interest than the bond which is proposed in this bill? I apprehend not. Those who have now their money invested in Government bonds have invested in such securities because of their confidence in the ability of the Government to pay when called upon, because of their convertibility whenever they see proper to go into the market and sell them, and because of the certainty of the prompt payment of the interest. In my opinion a large percentage of the money already invested in five and six percents will necessarily go into the new loan because of the certainty which it offers for the prompt payment of the interest. In this way I think we may arrive at some conclusion that there is a possibility and a probability of floating the loan at either 3 or 3½ per cent., as Congress may determine.

I believe that the present rate of the securities of the Government in the market pay a little over 3 per cent. About 3½ perhaps is as near an approximation to it as possible; and if I could fix the rate of interest of these bonds, I would fix it as near what the present securities now in the market bring as I could approach. The four percents bring about 113 or 113½. I think that was about the price yesterday. That would make the interest upon the amount which would be required to purchase one of these bonds a little over 3 per cent.; less than 3½.

Mr. EATON. Less than 3½; about 3.15.

Mr. SAULSBURY. That would be the nearest approximation to the present value of those bonds; and if there was an amendment offered to that effect, I should vote for it in preference to a rate of either 3 per cent. or 3½ per cent., because it would be based upon the present value of the bonds of the Government in the market. I do not know that I shall have the opportunity to vote for such an amendment. The Senator from Connecticut, I believe, indicated a purpose to offer such an amendment, but I am not sure that he will offer it. I am driven, therefore, to determine the question between a rate of 3 or 3½ per cent., and I shall vote as the best consideration of my mind for the lowest rate of interest. I shall do so, however, with some doubt that we may not thus be embarrassed in the negotiation of these bonds. I am certain that the capitalists of the country will combine to depress, if possible, the market for these bonds. They are ever alert to their own interests, and if they could defeat the sale of these bonds in the hope of getting a larger interest on them in the future, I have no doubt they would do so.

The amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] I believe proposes to place these bonds within the reach of the people of the country, and I think that that is a very wise arrangement. There are hundreds and thousands of men in this country with small means who would be glad to invest temporarily their money which they may want to use at no very distant day in some security that would pay them interest in the mean time. The banks of the country also have now in their vaults a large amount of deposits upon which they are paying a tax to the Government, and yet they find great difficulty in finding at times persons who want to borrow. I was told not more than two weeks ago, in speaking of this very bill, by a director of a bank in my State that his bank had recently gone into the market and bought bonds because they had in their vaults money of their depositors that they could not discount upon, and they had sought investment by buying bonds which they could convert again whenever they desired to do so for the purposes of discount. We have I believe in this country some eight thousand banking institutions.

Mr. BAYARD. About six.

Mr. SAULSBURY. About six, my colleague says. Each of those banks has to-day a surplus of money on deposit, I presume. I know that is said to be the case with most of the banks in my own State, and I presume it is the case with the banks all over the country. That money has to lie there or be invested in something that will pay them interest. A few years ago I know when the city banks were offering interest upon deposits, the country banks would frequently take their surplus and carry it to the city and loan it to the city banks at a nominal interest rather than have it lie in their own vaults until such time as they should want to use it for purposes of discount. My impression is that out of the six thousand banking institutions of the country a large part of this money will be desired for purposes of temporary investment, knowing as they will know that when the bonds are once floated upon the market they can convert them and realize upon them at their pleasure.

Therefore, in my opinion, while it may not be a matter of positive certainty that we can negotiate this loan at 3 per cent., the probabilities are that we can. If we can, we shall save the Government annually about three million dollars, and in the end, if the average life of the bonds should be ten years, we will have saved to the Government $30,000,000. That is a matter that I think ought to have weight and consideration in determining our votes upon this question. I should very much dislike to vote for 3½ per cent., and before one-half of the loan was on the markets of the country see the price in the hands of capitalists who had bought them up. Whatever can be saved ought to be saved. If these bonds are issued at 3 per cent. and go into the market, if there is no impediment to getting them once upon the market by combinations of the capitalists and money dealers, I have no fear then but that they will ever afterward bring par in any of the markets of the country.

There is another consideration that ought not to be lost sight of. This perhaps is the last bond which will be issued by the Government, at least for a great many years. We ought to be able to pay the entire indebtedness of the country before the four percents become due. By a proper husbandry of the resources of the country, by economical appropriations by Congress, we shall be able, in my opinion, to liquidate every dollar of the public debt before the 4 per cent. bonds become due. That end can be defeated by extravagant appropriations on the part of Congress, but a wise husbandry of our resources will, in my opinion, enable us to liquidate the debts of this Government as they fall due, so that there will be no further necessity for another issue of bonds of the Government. The class of persons who would rather have the securities of the Government than anything else for investment, will take notice of the fact and will, in my opinion, be induced thereby to place their money in this loan. Some of the States now are begining to think about negotiating their loans at a rate of interest not much higher than that proposed by the Committee on Finance of the Senate. In my own State, with the small debt that we have, bearing 6 per cent. interest, a bill is now pending in the Legislature to refund the debt before the time expires when it is absolutely payable, and there is no doubt in the minds of the people of the State but that the debt of that State will be taken at 4 per cent. readily, and yet the bonds are subject to taxation. While I have had some difficulty in arriving at a conclusion between the 3 and 3½ rate of interest, I shall give my vote for the lower rate for this loan.

I wish to notice one other provision of the bill, and that is the fifth section, which has been stricken out by the committee. I have looked at that provision, and I cannot see that there is any necessity for striking it out. There is nothing compulsory upon any bank whatever. It does not propose that every bank in the country shall surrender up its present securities and deposit with the Government securities bearing a lower rate of interest. It only provides that when a banking institution wishes to increase its capital or when a new bank wishes to start it must deposit with the Government its new loan. There is nothing harsh, nothing improper in that. On the contrary, I think it is the duty of Congress, when the Government is paying to the banks interest upon the bonds deposited with the Government, to provide that the lowest rate of interest-bearing bond shall be made the security for the circulation and the deposits of the banks. If you were to give it a retroactive aspect and attempt to compel banks to withdraw their present securities and deposit the 3 per cent. bonds, it might have the appearance of harshness toward the banks; but I do not think that the provision of the bill as it passed the House will bear hardly upon any banking interests of the country, and therefore I cannot see the propriety of striking that out.

In reference to the rate for negotiating the loan, I have not given much consideration to that point, but it does strike me that one-fourth of 1 per cent. is ample compensation for the negotiation, provided we have to resort to the agency of banking institutions or syndicates for that purpose; but I have no doubt if the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] is adopted, and the loan is offered to the public, it will be taken very largely without the intervention of syndicates or banking institutions, or any persons who have to be paid commissions. However, that is not a matter of so much importance as the interest to be paid on the bonds, which, I think, is the great question involved in the bill.

I shall vote cheerfully for the time designated by the Senate Committee on Finance. I believe that the option of the Government ought to be retained, and ought not to be parted with for a longer period than five years. Therefore I concur most heartily with the amendment of the Senate committee. As I shall have to vote upon this question I thought I would state some of the reasons which shall govern my vote.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, is there any necessity for this refunding bill, or for any refunding bill? Is there any obligation, legal or moral, requiring the refunding of any of the bonds of the United States at this time? Let us examine the facts and determine that question. I say that there is no obligation, legal or equitable, requiring the refunding, the redemption, or the payment of any of the bonds of the United States, now or in the immediate future, except only $710,550 bonds known as the "Oregon war debt."

Let us, then, ascertain the exact condition of the public debt to-day and our obligation at present and in the immediate future in relation to it.

I hold in my hand the public debt statement issued by the Treasury Department for the month of January, 1881, which shows the financial exhibit to January 31, 1881. The statement is as follows:

Table showing the interest-bearing debt of the United States.

| Title of loan. | Authorizing act. | Rate. | When redeemable. | Total. |
|---|---|---|---|---|
| | | Per cent. | | |
| Oregon war debt | March 2, 1861 | 6 | | $710,550 |
| Loan of July and August, 1861 | July 17 and August 5, 1861 | 6 | June 30, 1881 | 144,339,900 |
| Loan of 1863, (1881's) | March 3, 1863 | 6 | June 30, 1881 | 57,216,100 |
| Funded loan of 1881 | July 14, 1870, and January 20, 1871 | 5 | May 1, 1881 | 469,651,050 |
| Funded loan of 1891 | July 14, 1870, and January 20, 1871 | 4½ | Sept. 1, 1891 | 250,000,000 |
| Funded loan of 1907 | July 14, 1870, and January 20, 1871 | 4 | July 1, 1907 | 738,480,550 |
| Refunding certificates | February 26, 1879 | 4 | | 867,250 |
| Navy-pension fund | July 23, 1868 | 3 | | 14,000,000 |
| Aggregate of interest-bearing debt | | | | 1,675,265,400 |

Let us examine each one of these liabilities. The Oregon war debt was issued under the act approved March 2, 1861, which is found in the Statutes at Large, volume 12, page 198:

That for the payment of claims provided for in this act, the Secretary of the Treasury may, if he deem it expedient, issue to the claimants, or their legal representatives, bonds of the United States of a denomination not less than $50, redeemable in twenty years, and bearing interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, with coupons attached, and payable annually or semi-annually at the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Of the amount originally issued $710,550 now remain unpaid. These bonds are absolutely payable on the 1st of July, 1881. There is no question of the ability of the Government to meet and pay them on that day. That, I say, is the only item of indebtedness which is absolutely and unqualifiedly payable now or in the immediate future.

Now we come to the second item, the loan of July and August, 1861. This loan was issued under two acts. The first was the act of July 17, 1861, volume 12, page 259. The first section provides:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to borrow on the credit of the United States, within twelve months from the passage of this act, a sum not exceeding $250,000,000, or so much thereof as he may deem necessary for the public service, for which he is authorized to issue coupon bonds, or registered bonds, or Treasury notes, in such proportions of each as he may deem advisable; the bonds to bear interest not exceeding 7 per cent. per annum, payable semi-annually, irredeemable for twenty years, and after that period redeemable at the pleasure of the United States.

The act of August 5, 1861, in regard to the redeemability says:

And payable at the pleasure of the United States after twenty years from date.

I will read a copy of the bond issued under the acts of July 17 and August 5, 1861, furnished by the Secretary of the Treasury. This is the form of the bond:

Acts of July 17 and August 5, 1861.

The United States of America are indebted unto —— —— or assigns the sum of —— dollars, redeemable after the 30th day of June, 1881, with interest from the first day of —— inclusive at six per cent. per annum payable on the first days of January and July in each year. This debt is authorized by acts of Congress approved July 17 and August 5, 1861, and is transferable on the books of this office.

That obligation, that class of bonds, can be paid at the pleasure of the Government at any time after the 30th of June, 1881.

The next item in the public debt is the loan of 1863, issued under the act of March 3, 1863. This was entitled "An act to provide ways and means for the support of the Government," volume 12, Statutes at Large, page 709, and provides:

SECTION 1. That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to borrow, from time to time, on the credit of the United States, a sum not exceeding $300,000,000 for the current fiscal year, and $600,000,000 for the next fiscal year, and to issue therefor coupon or registered bonds, payable at the pleasure of the Government after such periods as may be fixed by the Secretary, not less than ten nor more than forty years from date, in coin.

The Secretary had the authority under this law to prescribe the time not less than ten nor more than forty years. The Secretary prescribed the time, June 30, 1881. These bonds are redeemable, not payable, at any time after that at the pleasure of the United States. These bonds are payable in coin. The loan of July and August, 1861, was issued before anything save gold and silver had been made a legal tender in this country, and it is equitably, and properly, too, payable in coin.

The next item is the funded loan of 1881, and I will treat together the funded loan of 1881, the funded loan of 1891, and the funded loan of 1907. The bonds of those loans were issued under the funding act of July 14, 1870, entitled "An act to authorize the refunding of the national debt," volume 16, page 272. I will only read the clause of section 1 which refers to the redeemability or payment of these bonds:

And of denominations of $50 or some multiple of that sum, redeemable in coin of the present standard value, at the pleasure of the United States, after ten years from the date of their issue, and bearing interest, payable semi-annually in such coin, at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum.

That authorized the issue of $200,000,000. Then there was a further authority to issue—

A sum or sums not exceeding in the aggregate $300,000,000 of like bonds, the same in all respects, but payable, at the pleasure of the United States, after fifteen years from the date of their issue, and bearing interest at the rate of 4½ per cent. per annum; also a sum or sums not exceeding in the aggregate $1,000,000,000 of like bonds, the same in all respects, but payable, at the pleasure of the United States, after thirty years from the date of their issue, and bearing interest at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum.

These bonds were issued in pursuance of that act as amended by the act of January 20, 1871, which made the interest payable quarterly instead of semi-annually, and changed the amount that could be issued of the different classes of bonds. Each one of these bonds has certain words written upon its face. I will read one of these bonds; they are all the same. It is a bond furnished me at one time by my good friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WALLACE,] and I am sure it was returned to him—a $50 bond:

1877. Four per cent. consols of the United States. 1907.

Principal and interest payable in coin.

(50)

At the Treasury of the United States.

The United States of America are indebted to the bearer in the sum of Fifty Dollars.

7115 7115.

This bond is issued in accordance with the provisions of an act of Congress entitled "An act to authorize the refunding of the national debt, approved July 14, 1870," amended by an act approved January 20, 1871, and is redeemable at the pleasure of the United States after the 1st day of July, A. D. 1907, in coin of the standard value of the United States on said July 14, 1870, with interest in such coin from the day of the date hereof at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum, payable quarterly, on the 1st day of October, January, April, and July, in each year. The principal and interest are exempt from the payment of all taxes or duties of the United States as well as from taxation in any form by or under State, municipal, or local authority.

Washington, July 1, 1877.

S. J. MILLARD,
Register of the Treasury.

Act of July 14, 1870.

This is one of the bonds of the funded loan of 1907, but the bonds of the funded loan of 1881 and the funded loan of 1891, are in precisely the same form, using the same words, except as to dates, amounts, &c.

Thus, Mr. President, you will see that the law under which these bonds were issued makes them redeemable at the pleasure of the United States, at the option, the discretion of the United States after certain dates: the five percents after 1881, the four-and-a-half percents after 1891, and the four percents after 1907; and you will note another fact that these bonds, principal and interest, are payable in coin, and not only that, but they are payable in coin of a particular kind, and that is the coin of standard value on July 14, 1870, and the coin of standard value on that day was the old silver dollar of 412½ grains weight, .9 part fine, and the gold dollar of 25.8 grains, .9 part fine. These bonds must then be paid either in the silver dollar, or in the gold dollars; and the principal and the interest are exempt from all kinds of taxation. This exemption has not been extended to all bonds of the United States. The interest in this case is absolutely exempt, as well as the principal.

I shall not touch upon the refunding certificates of February 26, 1879, at 4 per cent. Only $867,250 remain unpaid. They can be funded into 4 per cent. bonds, or could have been at any time within a year after the date of their issue. Nor shall I treat of the Navy pension fund, $14,000,000, bearing only 3 per cent. interest, which is simply a trust fund created by an act passed in 1799.

The law and the bonds themselves show that there is no obligation, legal or equitable, existing upon the part of the United States to pass any kind of a funding bill now or in the immediate future. The next question is, is it the policy of the Government to pass a refunding bill at this time; is it to the interest of the tax-payers of the country to pass a refunding bill? That is the only question before the Senate to-day; is it to the interest of the tax-payers of this country to pass a refunding bill? There is no obligation upon us to redeem or pay off these bonds in the immediate future. We have the right now under existing law to let these bonds remain until we have paid them off. They are payable at our pleasure, when we choose.

Let us look for a moment to our obligation in regard to these bonds.

Under the act of February 25, 1862, the sinking fund was created. I will read section 5 of that act:

That all duties on imported goods shall be paid in coin, or in notes payable on demand heretofore authorized to be issued and by law receivable in payment of public dues, and the coin so paid shall be set apart as a special fund, and shall be applied as follows:

First. To the payment in coin of the interest on the bonds and notes of the United States.

Second. To the purchase or payment of 1 per cent. of the entire debt of the United States, to be made within each fiscal year after the 1st day of July, 1862, which is to be set apart as a sinking fund, and the interest of which shall in like manner be applied to the purchase or payment of the public debt as the Secretary of the Treasury shall from time to time direct.

Third. The residue thereof to be paid into the Treasury of the United States.

There is the obligation in regard to the sinking fund and the ultimate payment of the public debt. That was affirmed by the act of July 14, 1870, in section 6:

In addition to other amounts that may be applied to the redemption or payment of the public debt, an amount equal to the interest on all bonds belonging to the aforesaid sinking fund shall be applied, as the Secretary of the Treasury shall from time to time direct, to the payment of the public debt as provided for in section 5 of the act aforesaid.

Referring to the act of February 25, 1862. Now, what are our obligations in regard to the sinking fund at this time? Have we met it? Are we free from any further responsibility? Or do we have to continue payments upon it, admitting the validity of the law and the policy of the law, bringing nothing of that into question? I read from the finance report of the Secretary of the Treasury of 1880, on page 7:

Thus it is probable that there can be applied to the purchase of bonds for the sinking fund during the present fiscal year—

The year ending June 30, 1881—

an amount sufficient to cover the whole deficiency now existing on the account of that fund, thus making good the whole amount of the sinking fund as required by law.

Then on the 1st of July, 1881, we shall simply be even with the sinking fund. The requirements of that sinking fund for 1882 are estimated at $41,639,840.20. That is given in one table upon page 8. On page 11 the Secretary has given a statement of the requirements of the sinking fund from July 1, 1882, up to June 30, 1891. He says:

The requirements of the sinking fund prior to the maturity of the 4½ per cent. bonds, for a period of ten years, from 1882 to 1891, both inclusive, are estimated as follows:

|---|---|
| For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882 | $43,386,645 00 |
| For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883 | 45,122,110 80 |
| For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1884 | 46,926,995 24 |
| For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885 | 48,804,075 04 |
| For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886 | 50,756,238 04 |
| For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887 | 52,786,487 56 |
| For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1888 | 54,897,947 07 |
| For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889 | 57,093,864 95 |
| For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1890 | 59,377,619 55 |
| For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1891 | 61,752,724 33 |
| | 520,904,707 58 |

June 30, 1891, the sinking fund will require over sixty-one million dollars. The amount between June 30, 1881, and June 30, 1891, ranges from $43,000,000 up to $61,000,000, increasing regularly year by year. Under existing obligations we must extinguish from $43,000,000 to $61,000,000 of the public debt each year between this and 1891. That is a duty which we owe to pay off not less than this amount under existing law. Now, I return to the question: Should it be our policy to pass a refunding law? Is it to our interest to pass a refunding law? We now have $202,266,550 of 6 per cent. bonds and $469,651,050 of 5 per cent. bonds, making a total of $671,917,600 of 5 and 6 per cent. bonds, which we can pay at any time we choose in the future. They are the only bonds that are payable, or even redeemable, at the pleasure of the United States.

The next item that becomes redeemable is the $250,000,000 item of the funded loan of 1891. Then the next item is the funded loan of 1907, $738,000,000. We must pay from $43,000,000 to $61,000,000 every year between this and 1891. After that the amount required for the sinking fund will increase, and we shall then have the four-and-a-halfs that we can reach and commence paying to the amount of $250,000,000. These bonds are all payable in coin.

Now, is it to our interest, to the interest of the tax-payers of this country, that we should change these obligations, change the character of the debt and the obligation existing under the law as to paying it off? There can be but one inducement, and that is the interest of the tax-payers. If we can change the status of the existing bonds and the laws under which they are issued and refund them into a new bond with new obligations and in the end pay off those new bonds with a less sum of money than it will require to pay off the existing bonds, principal and interest, then it will be to the interest of the tax-payers to do it.

Now, mark you, Mr. President, we must pay from $43,000,000 to $61,000,000 a year up to 1891. We must therefore keep a part of this indebtedness under our control. If we do not, if we refund all these bonds so that we cannot pay them between this and 1891, we shall be compelled to go into the market and purchase for the sinking fund from $43,000,000 to $61,000,000 annually, and at present rates pay from 13 to 15 per cent. premium upon them.

In determining whether it is to the interest of the tax-payers to pass a refunding bill we must look to certain guiding principles. The first principle that should guide us is that the public debt should be paid at the earliest practicable time consistent with the best interests of the tax-payers. That has been, is, and I trust ever will be the settled policy of the Government of the United States; it has been, is, and ever will be the settled policy of the great political party whose principles I espouse. The second principle to guide us is that the largest possible amount of the public debt should be carried or borne in the form of non-interest-bearing obligations, such as Treasury notes, &c., which can be maintained by the people in circulation at par. It is to the interest of this Government that just as much of its public debt as can be kept in circulation without any interest being paid upon it shall be so kept out. The third great principle is that the remaining portion of our public debt should be carried or borne in obligations bearing the lowest possible rates of interest at which they can be sold and kept at par.

With these three principles guiding us, let us examine and see whether we should pass a refunding bill. The refunding bill as it came from the House of Representatives, proposed to issue not exceeding $400,000,000 of 3 per cent. bonds, redeemable at the pleasure of the United States after five years, and payable ten years after the date of their issue, and certificates to the amount of $300,000,000, in denominations of $10, $20, and $50, registered and coupon, at 3 per cent., and redeemable at the pleasure of the United States after one year, and payable in ten years from the date of their issue; and both these bonds and certificates, as they are denominated in the House bill, are to be issued under the provisions and subject to the limitations of the act of July 14, 1870; that is, they will have inserted upon their face, "redeemable in coin of the standard value of the United States on said July 14, 1870," or on the day of the passage of this refunding act. In other words, they, too, will be payable in coin just as the present bonds are payable in coin, which coin will always mean gold and silver.

Section 2 of that bill authorizes the exchange of these bonds for the 5 and 6 per cent. bonds, the holders to receive the difference in interest from the date of the exchange to the date of maturity, but it excludes the Pacific Railroad bonds from the operation of this act.

Section 3 provides that the expense of negotiating these bonds shall be one-fourth of 1 per cent.

Section 4 gives the Secretary of the Treasury, if necessary, power to use not over $50,000,000 of the gold and silver coin now in the Treasury for the redemption of these bonds, and to apply any surplus money to the purchase or redemption of United States bonds or certificates, which shall not become a part of the sinking fund, but be canceled.

In the last clause there is a wise provision that they "shall constitute no part of the sinking fund." If they were made a part of the sinking fund, and we purchased them at the rate of $75,000,000 a year, as we have done the past year, it would only require a few years until the sinking fund would run up to such an amount that it would be very difficult for the taxes of the country, even with largely increased revenues, to meet it. The bonds paid by this $50,000,000 will be taken out of the operation of the sinking fund.

Section 5 provides that after May 1, 1881, the 3 per cent. bonds are the only ones that shall be receivable for national-bank circulation or for the security for Government deposits; but the banks can substitute for the call-bonds any other issues on which interest has not ceased.

That was the bill substantially as it came from the House. The Senate Committee on Finance propose to amend it by striking out the 3 per cent. bond and making it a 3½ per cent. bond; making the interest payable semi-annually, and specifying the denominations of the bonds to be in sums of $50 or multiples of that sum; striking out the ten years as the limit of payment and inserting twenty years; striking out "certificates" and inserting "Treasury notes not exceeding," and striking out the denominations of the Treasury notes and making them in $10 or some multiple of that sum, and prescribing a rate not exceeding 3½ per cent. as the interest on them, payable semi-annually

The Senate Finance Committee further propose to increase the amount allowed for negotiation to one-half of 1 per cent. The committee change section 4, and authorize the use of $50,000,000 in coin, gold and silver, temporarily only, and insert an amendment requiring it to be repaid into the Treasury out of the sale of these bonds or Treasury notes. The committee strike out the entire fifth section, and then they add another section in lieu of it.

Now, Mr. President, is it to our interest to pass the bill as it came from the House, or the bill as amended by the Committee on Finance? I say very frankly that the present financial system of this Government does not meet my approbation, and is not what I think it should be. A great deal of patchwork has been placed upon it. It has been greatly improved, it has been made successful by the patchwork legislation that has been put upon it, or it would have broken down under its own weight. On account of the contradictory views of Senators and members of the House, I cannot secure that better system I desire.

I say that it is to the interest of the tax-payers of this country that we shall pass a refunding bill, provided it is properly guarded and limited. It is to our interest to pass a funding bill placing the interest at 3 per cent., and keeping the indebtedness within our control. It is not our policy to place this indebtedness beyond redemption or payment at the pleasure of the United States.

Now, can we negotiate a 3 per cent. bond at par, and thus save to the tax-payers of the country 2 per cent. on the 5 per cent. bonds and 3 per cent. on the others? This must necessarily be very largely a question of speculation. No one can demonstrate mathematically that a 3 per cent. bond can be negotiated at par. We must necessarily look into the past history of the country, consider its present condition, and form our opinion. I see that the Finance Committee has been very largely guided by the opinion and judgment of the honorable Secretary of the Treasury, who has occupied this position for nearly four years past. I propose briefly to review the opinions of the Secretary of the Treasury in regard to refunding the bonds of the United States and the rate of interest at which they can be negotiated, and to see whether the Secretary even himself fixes 3½ per cent. as the lowest rate of interest at which a bond can be negotiated; and if he does fix that amount as the very lowest rate at which a bond can be negotiated, is it a correct judgment, and has he in the past proved that his opinions in regard to rates of interest are correct?

The first thing I shall notice in this connection is the finance report of 1878. On page 19 the Secretary in his report says:

The best mode suggested is that the Department be authorized to issue certificates of deposit of the United States of the denomination of $10, bearing interest at the rate of 3.65 per cent. per annum and convertible at any time within one year after their issue into the 4 per cent. bonds authorized by the refunding act, and to be issued only in exchange for United States notes sent to the Treasury by mail or otherwise.

In 1878 he thought a one-year Treasury note convertible into a 4 per cent. bond could be floated at 3.65 per cent. interest. I come now to the finance report of 1879. On pages 19 and 20 the Secretary says:

It is respectfully suggested that authority be given at the present session of Congress to issue, sell, and dispose of, at not less than par in coin, 4 per cent. bonds of the description set forth in the said act of July 14, 1870, and refunding certificates of the description set forth in the act of February 26, 1879, with like qualities, privileges, and exemptions, except as hereinafter stated, to the extent necessary to redeem the bonds falling due on or before July 1, 1881, above described, and to use the proceeds for that purpose.

In 1879 the Secretary recommended the refunding of these same bonds in 4 per cent. bonds; and hear what he says:

It is hoped that the advancing credit of the country will enable the Secretary to sell such bonds and certificates at a premium, but it seems better to maintain the general conditions of the 4 per cent. bond rather than to undertake to sell a bond at lower interest. The 4 per cent. consol is now universally known. The rate of interest is as low as will generally maintain the bond at par, and the premium will measure its advance above par at favorable periods.

Now I come to the finance report of 1880, made at the beginning of this session of Congress. What does he say on page 12?

The Secretary, therefore, recommends that provision be made for the issue of an amount not exceeding $400,000,000 of Treasury notes in denominations not less than $10, bearing interest not exceeding 4 per cent. per annum, and running from one to ten years, to be sold at not less than par, the amount maturing during any year not to exceed the sinking fund for that year, and the proceeds to be applied to the payment of 5 and 6 per cent. bonds maturing in 1881. It is believed that, with the present favorable state of the money market, a sufficient amount of such Treasury notes, bearing an annual interest of 3 per cent—

Mark the words, "bearing an annual interest of 3 per cent"—

can be sold to meet a considerable portion of the maturing bonds; but it is better to confer upon the Department a discretionary power to stipulate for a higher maximum rate, to avoid the possibility of failure.

He says further:

It is also recommended that authority be given to sell at par an amount not exceeding $400,000,000 of bonds of the character and description of the 4 per cent. bonds of the United States now outstanding, but bearing a rate of interest not exceeding 3.65 per cent. per annum, and redeemable at the pleasure of the United States after fifteen years.

That is his recommendation in 1880. Now I will briefly notice the views of the Secretary at other times. I hold in my hand "Notes of a conference between the Committee on Banking and Currency of the House of Representatives and Hon. John Sherman, Secretary of the Treasury, April 1 and 4, 1878." On page 9 the Secretary says:

To these I answer, that I believe that, with such auxiliary legislation as is pending in both Houses, we can sell enough 4 per cent. bonds to prepare for resumption; but, if I am mistaken in this, we can sell either 4½ or 5 per cent. bonds, which they admit will command gold, silver, and bank-notes, to maintain resumption. Some of these gentlemen have proposed to me that, if I sell them 4½ per cent. bonds at par in coin, they will guarantee enough coin for resumption; and I have some better offers from other banks and bankers, so that, on this point, it is only a question of rate of interest on bonds. When it becomes clear that money cannot be had for 4 per cent., it is time enough to pay 4½. The silver bill has crippled my power to sell 4 per cent. bonds, but a wise savings bill, that will enable me to deal directly with the people, would go far to repair this.

"Crippled" by the legislation of Congress in passing the silver bill in his refunding operations in selling 4 per cent. bonds!

Mr. TELLER. What is the date of that?

Mr. COCKRELL. This interview was April 1 and April 4, 1878, soon after the passage of the silver bill and soon after he had sold $50,000,000 of the 4½ per cent. bonds. Since the time that awful silver bill crippled the Secretary of the Treasury and made him lame and halt and blind, he has been enabled to sell over $700,000,000 in four percents at par, and to-day those bonds command a premium of 13 per cent. in the market, notwithstanding the terribly damaging, demoralizing influence of that obnoxious silver bill, as the Secretary of the Treasury and certain parties are disposed to term it.

I read further from page 10 of this interview. Secretary Sherman says, in answer to General Ewing:

I have written propositions from these gentlemen, and from Mr. Coe himself—that if I will give them 4½ per cent. bonds instead of four percents, they will guarantee resumption.

President of the National Bankers' Association—

Yes, and to-day if the Secretary will give them 3½ per cent. bonds they will guarantee the sale of them; no doubt of it. Then they were trying to get the Secretary to sell a 4½ per cent., and they were throwing every possible obstacle in the way of resumption. To show that, I will read from page 9 again. Says Secretary Sherman:

Upon the second point, it may as well be understood that the national banks cannot throw upon the Government the burden of redeeming their notes. The attempt would be suicide. They are bound to redeem their notes on demand at the Treasury with United States notes or coin, and to maintain in their vaults very large reserves of United States notes. Any effort of theirs to force the redemption of their reserves of United States notes in coin would at once cause the Government to withdraw all Government deposits from them, to present all bank-notes held or received by the Government for redemption, and, if need be, to exchange United States notes for bank-notes.

Such a struggle as these gentlemen contemplate would end in their losing their power to issue circulating notes at all. Their talk about forming a line to break the Government is not discreet and is not dangerous.

I read again from Secretary Sherman, on page 11:

The reason why I cannot sell bonds, is because they have got the impression in Europe that this silver bill is going to derange matters, and that belief brought back upon us (as these gentlemen say) seventy-five millions of bonds. As a matter of course, they came into competition with the Secretary in selling bonds; and as long as they had their bonds to sell under a scaring market, I could not sell bonds unless the rate of interest was raised.

Secretary Sherman, in answer to another question put to him by Mr. PHILIPS, says:

Then you cannot resume safely unless you can sell bonds at a higher rate of interest?

I do not say that. I think I can. If you pass a bill to enable me to sell directly to the people, I think I can sell 4 per cent. bonds.

Now I come to the interview between the United States Senate Committee on Finance and Hon. John Sherman in 1880. We will come down to a close date——

Mr. FERRY. If the Senator will allow me in that connection, before he passes from the former interview, I think it is due the Secretary of the Treasury to remind the Senator that when the market changed, as the money market always changes by legislation whenever there is legislation pending, he acted accordingly. The market to-day fluctuates with the progress of this funding bill. When the Secretary of the Treasury found that the market did improve he arrested the sale of the four-and-a-halfs and sold the fours. So it is plain that the Secretary had his eye upon the money market and was seeking the interest of the Government and the people in the sales of four-and-a-halfs and fours.

Mr. COCKRELL. No question about that. That is a matter of history, as far as that is concerned; but the question is, would he have stopped the sale of the four-and-a-halfs at all if it had not been for the action that was taken by Congress.

Mr. FERRY. I would remind the Senator, since he has put that question to us, that there were sixty days when the fours could not be sold, nor the four-and-a-halfs either, owing to legislation and owing to the peculiar condition of affairs.

Mr. COCKRELL. What does the Senator say there was?

Mr. FERRY. Some sixty days when they could not be sold at all.

Mr. COCKRELL. When?

Mr. FERRY. Soon after the sale of the first $75,000,000.

Mr. COCKRELL. Does the Senator refer to January 1, 1879?

Mr. FERRY. I do not.

Mr. COCKRELL. When the four-and-a-half percents could not be sold or the four percents?

Mr. FERRY. January 1, 1879, was the time of resumption.

Mr. COCKRELL. When was it after this interview with Secretary Sherman that 4½ per cent. bonds could not be sold?

Mr. FERRY. The following spring.

Mr. COCKRELL. The spring of 1878?

Mr. FERRY. Yes.

Mr. COCKRELL. The great boom came to the country when the democratic party assumed control of Congress in 1879?

Mr. FERRY. The 1st of January, 1879, we all know was the date at which the redemption act took effect.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am aware of what occurred about the 1st of January, 1879, when the 4 per cent. bonds, but not the four-and-a halfs, were only worth 99.64, I believe; I have the exact figures somewhere.

Mr. PLUMB. If the Senator from Missouri predicates his advocacy of a 3 per cent. bond upon the fact that the credit of the Government is greatly improved by the accession of the democratic party to power, where is his warrant for supposing that now that the democratic party is going out of power, there will be any credit left at all?

Mr. COCKRELL. The surety the people have that it will soon come back into power; and it has not gone out yet. It is a well-settled fact, not a debatable proposition, that the democratic party will survive all the defeats that it has met or ever will meet, and will ere long control the destinies of this grandest country on earth, and this best Government enjoyed by American or any other people.

Mr. FERRY. I am glad to learn that the Senator entertains as to faith the view of the Good Book as to charity, that it "covereth a multitude of sins."

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, I will pass to Secretary Sherman in January, 1880. At page 46 of this interview, the Secretary says:

1. The 4 per cent. is already a very popular bond both in Europe and in this country, and is largely used in paying balances between bankers and between countries, as well as for trust-fund and savings-institution investment.

2. Experience indicates that the rate of interest is as low as it can be if the bonds are to be kept at par.

Now, mark you, we are discussing a refunding bill in 1880, and the Secretary says:

Experience indicates that the rate of interest is as low as it can be if the bonds are to be kept at par.

That is the four percents.

A statement of the issues of all the loans since the organization of the Government is published in the financial report of 1876. From that statement it will be seen that the Government has never been able to place a bond at as low a rate as 4 per cent., (until the recent operation,) and in only a few instances as low as 4½ per cent., and then for comparatively small amounts.

The table is given here. What does he further say in regard to the rate of interest? On page 48 he says:

As soon, however, as all the four percents were taken, and it was well understood that no more could be issued for refunding for several years, the price began to advance and has reached at the present time about 4 per cent. above par.

Was not that a wonderful thing that bankers, capitalists, men with money, would not loan that money to the Government at 4 per cent. as long as they could get 4½ per cent. for it, but the very moment the 4½ per cent. bonds were denied them and there was no Government investment at 4½ per cent., then the four percents went off by hundreds of millions! I believe the last purchase was $121,000,000.

It could hardly be expected, however, that should additional amounts be placed upon the market that any such premium as this would be maintained.

Oh, no; if we refund these bonds in four percents the present premium on the 4 per cent. bonds must be taken away. That was the financial opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury in 1880. We must pass a refunding bill issuing bonds bearing 4 per cent., notwithstanding the 4 per cent. bond was then 4 per cent. premium, because the issue of additional 4 per cent. bonds would bring the four percents down to par. Let us further see:

Should the exchange of four percents for the fives and sixes of 1881 be authorized as desired—

That was the exchange of the four percents in 1880 for a 5 or 6 per cent. bond at par—

the Government would undoubtedly be able to exchange a large portion, if not the entire amount, of the outstanding fives and sixes without using depository banks or syndicates to aid in the transaction, and without the payment of any double interest, the market value of the four percents being so high that holders of sixes would be glad to exchange bond for bond; and the Government cannot reasonably expect to make much better terms than these.

It is noticeable that there is not to-day a 3 per cent. or 3½ per cent. bond of any government which sells for par.

That is what Secretary Sherman said in 1880. I will in a few moments show that that statement is not true, and I will show it by Secretary Sherman's own tables.

Within the last century, the English 3 per cent. consols have sold as low as $47.20 for $100, yielding to the investor nearly 6⅜ per cent. interest.

The rate of 4 per cent. per annum is probably the most convenient rate in the calculation of interest that can be established.

* * * * * * *

Of course this would have no special bearing where it is only a question whether you pay 3.65 or 4 per cent interest.

* * * * * * *

Authority to issue the fours would make refunding a certainty from the start, which, I believe, would not be the case if any other bond should be authorized; and with authority to issue fours the possibility of being forced to pay a higher rate after 1881 can be avoided.

While we cannot foresee the future, it is not believed by any one—

Mark the language, the emphatic language—that a lower rate of interest is likely to prevail next year or the year after than now exists.

Secretary Sherman, with his financial acumen and wisdom, tells us, 1880, in January, that a lower rate of interest is not likely to prevail next year or the year after that than now exists. He says:

On the other hand, there is great danger that the rate of interest in this country may advance.

Do we not hear precisely the same words from the same source to-day in regard to a 3 per cent. bond. He then held to the 4 per cent. bond. Now he has within one year himself dropped down in his recommendation to a 3½ per cent. bond, and yet in 1880 he said that there was no probability that the rate of interest would be any lower than 4 per cent. in the next year or two.

New railroads, buildings, and business enterprises of all kinds are being pushed, and they all require capital; and with the present resources of the country this capital can be made to pay better than 4 per cent. interest; and when confidence is fully restored there is no reason to believe that people will be willing to accept 4 per cent. in lieu of 6 or 8 per cent. on their investments.

* * * * * * *

Again, we are to consider that the issue of national-bank notes is based upon the Government bond as collateral. On every $100 par value of bonds the bank is entitled to receive not to exceed 90 per cent. in notes. Should the banks be permitted to deposit 3.65 bonds as collateral for circulation the notes received would not be as well secured as they are at present.

We were then proposing to issue a 3.65 bond, and Secretary Sherman points at the great danger there would be to the holders of national-bank notes, 90 per cent. issued and based upon a 3.65 per cent. bond.

It is possible that bonds might so decline in value that the holders of notes might not be secure.

That is what he says on page 50. Now listen again:

In the first place there is no certainty of our being able to sell either one of these bonds at par. Before a 3.65 bond can be sold at par the 4 would necessarily have to be sold at 109 in order to realize the same rate of interest to the investor. They are now selling at 104, at which price they yield 3.76 per cent., probably the lowest rate of interest ever known in this country. I submit some tables bearing on this matter which speak for themselves.

He said in 1880 that a 3.65 or 3½ per cent. bond could not be negotiated; that if 3.65 bonds were negotiated it would be only when the four percents were at 109. To-day the four percents are at 113. Listen again, to show the financial acumen of Secretary Sherman in regard to casting coming events. He says, on page 52:

It is admitted by all persons who desire to place the three-and-one-halfs or three-sixty-fives, that such bonds must have a term of fifty years to run, in order to make a success of the loan.

Fifty years to run in order to make a successful loan.

Mr. President, let us come down to Secretary Sherman at a little later date, in 1881. Secretary Sherman, in 1881, in his statement before the Committee on Finance of the United States Senate, on page 3, says:

As to the rate of interest proposed I can only say that I do not believe the loan proposed can be negotiated at 3 per cent. interest.

I hope the Senate will note this language. He says further:

I do not say that it cannot be, but that is my opinion, based—

Based upon what? Based—mainly upon the fact that our bonds now in the market are selling at prices which yield more than 3 per cent. to the holders, showing that the borrowing power of the Government is not so low as 3 per cent., and that no government has ever yet sold its bonds bearing 3 per cent. interest at par.

These are the two facts: That the four percents are selling at a premium which makes them yield 3⅛ per cent. That is what it yields to-day, about 3⅛ per cent. Therefore you cannot negotiate a 3 per cent. bond. Then, no government in the world has ever negotiated a 3 per cent. bond at par.

Whenever bonds bearing that rate of interest have been offered they have been sold at enough less than par to produce to the investor about 3⅛ per cent. interest as a minimum. To ascertain this fact the Treasury Department obtained from several foreign governments the rates at which their loans had been disposed of, and I have tables based upon this information, some of the most important of which I will furnish to the committee.

The first one, in reference to Great Britain, shows only transactions in recent unrefunded loans. Let us look at that a moment. I hold in my hand a statement of the unfunded debt of Great Britain, 31st of March, 1880, prepared for the purpose of answering certain questions of the American Government. I desire to call attention to this, in connection with the statement of Secretary Sherman, that no bonds of any government have ever yet been sold at par bearing only 3 per cent. interest. I note here that exchequer bonds, £3,200,000, payable in 1880, in various dates, were issued and sold at par in 1879, bearing 2½ per cent. interest. I note that in 1877, exchequer bills, £1,471,300, payable in 1882, five years after date—mark the time—were negotiated at 2½ per cent. interest, at par, and to-day they are from par to four shillings premium. I note that in 1878, £464,000, payable in 1882, four years, bearing 2½ per cent. interest, sold in the market at a premium of one shilling. In 1879, £665,200, bearing 2½ per cent. interest and maturing in 1882, were issued and sold not only at par but at a premium of four shillings; and £26,000 in 1880; and they are all from par to four shillings premium.

I say there is no similarity whatever between the British consols and the bonds of the United States, and the comparison which is made between the consols or annuities of the British Government and the bonds of the United States is not a just or proper one. What is the difference? The consols are mere annuities; they are never payable; they are simply redeemable, and that is merely at the pleasure of the British Government. The United States bonds, on the contrary, are payable at fixed times; they are redeemable. The policy of the United States Government is to pay her bonds; the policy of the British Government is not to pay her bonds. There is another difference. The consols or annuities of the British Government are increasing in amount every year. There is no assurance given that they ever will be extinguished or paid off. On the contrary, the bonds of the United States are diminishing every year; and it is a certain, fixed, established fact that inside of thirty years every interest-bearing obligation of this Government will be totally extinguished and paid. There is another difference between them. The interest on the British consols is taxable; it is taxed to-day, and it can be taxed at the will and pleasure of the British Government. There is no limitation upon the power of the British Government to tax the income or interest upon its consols. On the contrary, in regard to the bonds of the United States, as I have shown, those issued under the act of July 14, 1870, and proposed to be issued under this refunding bill, the principal and interest can never be taxed, either by the General Government or any local or municipal authority. In the fourth place, the market for the British consols is confined almost exclusively to England, while the bonds of the United States are held and have a ready market in almost every country of the world. Without any disparagement to the mother country, I say to-day with pride that the credit, the stability, and the prosperity of the United States are far superior to Great Britain, and her future more splendid, promising, and glorious.

Therefore, to compare the British consols with the United States bonds is unjust; it is not legitimate. It is legitimate, however, to compare the United States bonds redeemable after five years and the Treasury notes with the exchequer bills, the table of which I have just read. England to-day can negotiate a 2½ per cent. treasury note, precisely like this we are proposing to negotiate at 3½ per cent. She can negotiate it at 2½ per cent. and put a premium upon it. The record shows that. We can do better.

Mr. ALLISON. We can issue them without any interest.

Mr. COCKRELL. A bond payable in five years, as is proposed here, is more nearly like the exchequer bills issued in England and payable in five years than to the British consols. I say the statement that Secretary Sherman makes that no government has ever negotiated a loan of bonds for 3 per cent. at par is not justified by the statement that he gives, that he has obtained from foreign countries. I know he makes a distinction; that he says the British consols and our regular bonds are parallel with each other and are the same, and that exchequer bills are different; but I say that distinction is not true. His comparisons of similarity are not true. The British consols and the United States bonds are not alike. The exchequer bills and the Treasury notes and the United States bonds redeemable in five years are nearer alike. I desire to read from another table in this same book:

As to the interest in New York at this time, which is an indication also, I have a table taken from the report of the Comptroller of the Currency, which Mr. Knox furnishes me. This is on call loans and on commercial paper, together with the average rate of discount in the Bank of England for the same time, showing the rates of interest. That probably would be better as an element of computation.

He gives this table. Then he says:

I wish to say that I have no doubt a portion of the Treasury notes, especially those which run a short time, can be sold as low as 3 per cent., and, therefore, I suggest, in addition to the amendments to the bill noted here, that if you should adopt the rate of 3½ for the certificates or notes, it might be made "not to exceed 3½," because I have no doubt that a short loan might be made at 3 per cent., or possibly less, judging from the English experience. They sold 2½ per cent. short-time notes, similar to those provided by this bill, at par at a time when money was lying idle. Investment in these short-time obligations was like having money on call. They did sell these 2½ per cent. notes at par; but they were either for three or six months; but I am inclined to think we could sell one-year Treasury notes, especially if our surplus revenue makes it a certainty they will be redeemed at maturity. I should think there might be a time when they would sell with a lower rate than 3 per cent.

On page 11 the Secretary says:

I would state that I have another table here which, I think, will be of value, and you will find it so when you come to study this matter. It shows the market value of a 3 per cent. bond at the present market rate. I think it is the same table that Senator FERRY has. It shows that a bond placed below the normal rate gradually runs down in value according to the period it has to run. A bond for $100 for one year at 3 per cent. will be worth $99.76, and will gradually run down until, if payable at the end of fifty years, its present worth will be only $93.80.

The Secretary further says:

Then, again, if you issue a 3 per cent. bond you would have to abandon the established policy of this country, which has always been to maintain its bonds at par. Ever since the scheme of Hamilton, it has been the policy of the Government to maintain its bonds at par, and not adopt the English system, to sell bonds bearing a fixed rate of interest at any price they would bring. Congress has always tenaciously held to the idea that the securities of the United States should be of such a character as would bring par. If, then, 3½ per cent. is the normal minimum rate of interest, the issue of bonds that would be continued below par would be a departure from that policy, and, besides that, it would impair the fund for the security of the note-holders in the banking system, and would compel the Comptroller of the Currency, as soon as this deficiency appears, to require the difference to be made good by additional bonds.

Senator KERNAN asked:

As I understand the secretary, in his judgment we should be able to negotiate a 5-10 bond at 3½ per cent.?

His answer is:

Yes; I think a 3½ per cent. bond, running for five years, would sell at par.

A year ago he did not think it would.

Again he says:

This is the table showing the net value of a 3½ per cent. bond, interest reinvested semi-annually, to run one, two, three, four, five, six, seven, eight, nine, ten, fifteen, twenty, thirty, and fifty years to payment, and of 3½ per cent. perpetuities, (or perpetual annuities,) computed on the basis of the present net prices in open market of the United States 4 per cent. consols of 1907.

According to this table, made within a year, in five years a 3½ per cent. bond would be worth 101.15. According to his own table he shows that the 3½ per cent. bond would be at par before it would be redeemable before five years from its date.

I have dealt thus with the Secretary of the Treasury because his opinions have guided in this matter; I am satisfied of it. I see how his opinions have varied, how he has asserted that a 4 per cent. bond could not be negotiated, how he has asserted that a 3½ per cent. bond or a 3.65 bond that did not run fifty years could not be thought of, that nobody would think of negotiating it. Now, I see he comes down to a 3½ per cent. bond and recommends it; but he does not say with as much firmness that a 3 per cent. bond could not be negotiated, as he said a year ago that a 3½ per cent. bond could not then be negotiated.

I hold in my hand a circular issued by Fisk & Hatch, of New York. I do not know them; I understand they are engaged largely in the sale and purchase of Government bonds. This circular treats of the rate of interest, and we are discussing that. What do they say? I have read from the report of Secretary Sherman, showing the rate of interest, and so on. They say:

During the same period the average rate of interest in the city of New York, for loans on Government bonds, as shown from our own books, has not exceeded 2½ per cent.

Mark you, that is not on a call loan. They say that money has been borrowed on a Government bond there in New York at 2½ per cent.

Mr. BAYARD. On call?

Mr. COCKRELL. Not on call.

Mr. BAYARD. It is on call.

Mr. COCKRELL. They do not say so. I will read what they say. I can read as well as the Senator from Delaware:

The Secretary of the Treasury, in a table furnished by him to the Finance Committee of the Senate, shows that the average rate of interest on call loans generally for various intervals during the same period was from 3.8 per cent. to 4.9 per cent. and that the average rate of interest on commercial paper was from 4.4 per cent. to 5.3 per cent.; from which it appears that the average rate of interest on loans on Government bonds has been but about one-half that on commercial paper, and but little over one-half the average rate on call loans of all classes.

That is the opinion of this gentleman, Mr. Hatch. Now I read just one moment. He says:

I believe that the practicability of negotiating a 3 per cent. funding loan at par depends now only upon the decision of Congress to make the rate 3 per cent. and no more; and that their action in so doing, and in thus removing from the public mind all hope of any higher rate, will of itself determine the result and insure success. I believe also that, should Congress authorize a funding loan bearing 3½ per cent., the bonds so authorized would, within six months after the Government had concluded their negotiation, advance in the market to a price at which they would not yield over 3 per cent. on the investment, and that it would thus be demonstrated that the Government might have saved the one-half per cent. per annum which investors and speculators had gained.

Fourth. The fact that the 4 per cent. bonds have not yet sold at a price at which they would not yield over 3 per cent. interest, (upon which considerable stress seems to be laid by those who doubt the ability of the Government to fund at 3 per cent.,) should not discourage the belief that a 3 per cent. loan can be negotiated at par; because, in the first place, the principal, if not the sole, reason why the 4 per cent. bonds have not already approached more nearly to the price at which they would yield but 3 per cent. is, as previously indicated, for the reason that the question not yet being decided, the hope remains with some that there may yet be 3 per cent. bonds offered at par; and, in the second place, because a large proportion of investors would prefer to buy a 3 per cent. bond at par rather than pay a high premium for a bond, even though it would ultimately yield a little more than 3 per cent. if held to maturity.

I think the facts that I have adduced here show conclusively that a 3 per cent. bond can be negotiated at par and that in a reasonable time it will be at a premium. I have gone over briefly the position of the Secretary of the Treasury, because he brings the strongest arguments that can be brought in favor of a higher rate of interest than 3 per cent., and I have done so in order to meet the strongest objections. I believe that a 3 per cent. bond can be negotiated at par, though it is largely a matter of speculation.

In the first place, the immense amount of capital, of money, in the United States to-day demanding, first, absolute security; second, freedom from anxiety to the mind of those who possess it; third, exemption from taxation of all kinds; and fourth, certainty and regularity in the payment of the interest and enjoyment of the income, makes me believe that a 3 per cent. bond can be negotiated. There are other reasons. There is the prospective increase of this amount of money. In 1880, during the last fiscal year, the deposits in the savings-banks in the State of New York alone aggregated $50,000,000 increase.

Mr. ALLISON. So Mr. Hatch says in his letter.

Mr. COCKRELL. I have the bank statement, which shows over forty-five million dollars, the bank examiner giving the names of the banks and the quantity of deposits, and showing the large increase. So it has been elsewhere.

Another thing that will aid greatly in securing the sale of a 3 per cent. bond is the payment of the bonds at the rate of $50,000,000 to $75,000,000 a year. We are paying and must pay from forty-odd millions to seventy-five millions of the debt annually. This money is paid to the holders of United States bonds. They are taken up and destroyed. That capital is forced to be invested in bonds or in the business enterprises of the country, and that of itself will greatly facilitate the sale of a 3 per cent. bond.

I have another reason for believing that a 3 per cent. bond can be negotiated; and that reason is that all the predictions for the last two or three years in regard to refunding at 4 per cent. and at 3½ have proved to be false. We were warned that the silver bill had crippled the Secretary of the Treasury, and he could not negotiate any more bonds; we were warned of this thing and that thing; and yet after all this, over six hundred million dollars of 4 per cent. bonds have been negotiated at par, and to-day they sell at 113. These bonds to-day only yield 3½ per cent. If you give $113 for a one-hundred-dollar 4 per cent. bond, it will only yield you about 3½ per cent.; my good friend from Connecticut, [Mr. EATON,] I think, says less than that. It may be a little less than that; I have not worked out the exact fraction.

Now, will any one give $113 for a one-hundred-dollar bond upon which he is only receiving $4 interest when he can buy just as good a bond bearing 3 per cent. interest at $100—at par? He gives $113 for a one-hundred-dollar 4 per cent. bond. If there is a fluctuation in the rate of that bond, he loses or gains. It is to the interest of this Government to maintain its bonds precisely at par and not above par. It facilitates their negotiation and their usefulness if we can maintain the bonds precisely at par.

Another reason why we can negotiate these 3 per cent. bonds is that this country to-day, the United States of America, the greatest country on earth, the Government of the United States, the best Government in the world, is in a condition to dictate honest, just, and reasonable terms in regard to the rate of interest that shall be paid by the people, the Government, the tax-payers, the sovereigns, to the individual citizens who hold the bonds. And they can do this, and it will have its effect upon all other business interests. They can do it justly, they can do it equitably.

I am in favor of a refunding bill. I will not consume the time of the Senate in showing the amounts that would be saved by passing a 3 per cent. refunding bill over and above the amount that we should have to pay out to extinguish the 5 and 6 per cent. bonds as they are, but it is to the interest of the tax-payers. I am in favor of issuing a 3 per cent. bond. I am willing to give it the conditions and limitations prescribed in the House bill. I am opposed to a 3½ per cent. bond. I do not believe it is just or right to the tax-payers of this country to require them to pay that rate of interest upon the bond, for the bond will go above par and be at a premium.

I am opposed to nearly all the amendments proposed by the Committee on Finance to this bill. I am not particular as to the length of time these bonds shall run, provided the Government retains an option in regard to them. I do not care whether it is a 5-10 bond, a 5-20, a 5-30, a 5-40, a 5-50, or a 5-100. If we have the option of redemption at any time after five years for the $400,000,000, I am satisfied. That will give us then five years to pay off the $271,000,000 of Treasury notes that will be issued. That will be a little above the requirements of the sinking fund, and then we shall not be placed in any worse condition than we are. We shall have the control of the debt. If the bonds are redeemable at any time after five years, we can pay them when we choose. We may let them run for fifty years; the interest of the Government may justify us in doing it. We shall certainly not pay off any of the 3 per cent. bonds remaining after 1891 until we have first paid off the four-and-a-half percents, and then if we have not been able to extinguish the four-and-a-half percents before 1907, we shall not pay any of the three percents then remaining until we have paid off the four percents, $738,000,000.

Therefore, it is best to redeem or pay. All I ask is that this option shall begin at the earliest date when we will probably be ready to redeem some of these bonds, so that we can—after refunding as we can now—pay off our bonds at par whenever we have surplus revenues applicable thereto; and in meantime pay only 3 per cent. interest instead of the 5 and 6 per cent. we are now paying.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. HARRIS in the chair.) The question is on the amendment proposed by the Committee on Finance, in line 18 of section 1, after the word "three," to insert "and one-half."

Mr. McPHERSON called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. FERRY. I ask that my amendment be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Michigan will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 18 of section 1 it is proposed to strike out the word "the" before "rate" and insert "a," and in the same line after the word "rate" to strike out "of" and insert "not exceeding;" so as to read "which shall bear interest at a rate not exceeding 3½ per cent.

Mr. FERRY. This bears upon the amendment of the committee, and this is the time for the Senate to consider it. I move it as an amendment to the amendment of the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Michigan to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. BAYARD. My own judgment expressed to the Senate and by the amendment as reported by the committee is that those words had better not be applied to what may be termed the long bonds provided for in this bill. But, sir, it is evident that there is a great difference of opinion in regard to the rate, a most important difference. I have expressed before, and shall not fatigue the Senate by repeating, my reasons for believing it essential that the rate of interest proposed should not be less than 3½ per cent. I also stated yesterday that it would be a solecism in the classification of the loans of the Government to have them offered "at a rate not exceeding" so much, by which it might result that bonds of the same class or authorized by the same law might be negotiated at different rates, and I saw in that a possibility of confusion which I believe has been recognized by the Secretary of the Treasury. I am told that that is rather imaginary than real, and that there will be no practical confusion in the issuance and disposition of these bonds if the amendment now proposed should be adopted and a portion of these bonds be found negotiable at a less rate than 3½ per cent. It is not with me the question of obtaining the lowest possible rate for the Government loan, but it is to offer it at such a rate as shall make it a certainty and a success. Therefore I shall not oppose strenuously the adoption of the amendment of the honorable Senator from Michigan, and I say further that it is yielding something of my own judgment, for the purpose of strengthening the rate proposed by the committee. I am given to understand that in the opinions of gentlemen of this body, there are some who will be disposed to vote for the rate of 3½ per cent. provided these words "not exceeding" are added. I cannot withhold from the Senate the belief that the words are not needed, for under this bill, the Secretary may not sell these bonds at less than par; he can sell them at anything over par which their value in the market will bring. Therefore, if, as has been here said, a 3½ per cent. bond is worth more than par, my answer is, if that be the case the Secretary will obtain it, and obtaining more than par, of course the rate of interest will be less to the investor and the gain will be to the Government.

But I do not propose to detain the Senate by debate; my object is to come to a vote upon this bill, and to come to it to-night. I have merely thought it proper, having charge of the bill, and having yesterday made, in reply to some Senator, an objection to these words, to state now why that objection is for the present withdrawn, or at least not pressed.

LINCOLN MEMORIAL PAPERS.

Mr. FERRY. Mr. President——

Mr. VOORHEES. If the Senator from Michigan will yield to me, I ask that this matter may be suspended without prejudice to anything, to enable me to report from the Committee on the Library the joint resolution (H. R. No. 178) authorizing certain books and mementoes in the possession of the Government to be placed in Memorial Hall of the National Lincoln Monument at Springfield, Illinois, in which the Senator from Illinois, not now in his seat, [Mr. DAVIS,] is very deeply interested. It having passed the House and been referred to the Committee on the Library, and having been authorized to report it, I ask that it may be passed. It will not take two minutes.

Mr. BAYARD. If it takes no more than a minute I shall not object.

Mr. VOORHEES. That is all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana asks unanimous consent of the Senate to consider at this time the joint resolution which has been reported from the Committee on the Library.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. THEODORE F. KING, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed the bill (H. R. No. 7104) making appropriations for the construction, completion, repair, and preservation of certain works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. BUTLER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 7101) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MORGAN, and Mr. HILL of Georgia, submitted amendments intended to be proposed by them respectively to the bill (H. R. No. 7036) to establish post-routes; which were referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HAMPTON and Mr. BAYARD submitted amendments intended to be proposed by them respectively to the bill (H. R. No. 7104) making appropriations for the construction, completion, repair, and preservation of certain works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

The bill (H. R. No. 7104) making appropriations for the construction, completion, repair, and preservation of certain works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, was read the first time by its title.

Mr. MORRILL. I object to the second reading of that bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. GARLAND in the chair.) The bill has been read the first time, and will lie on the table.

Several SENATORS. Let it be printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be printed.

Mr. VOORHEES. I desire to ask simply the effect of the objection of the Senator from Vermont?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Any Senator has the right to object to the second reading of a bill on the same day that it has had its first reading.

Mr. VOORHEES. I understand he has that right, but I wish to know how far it extends.

Mr. MORRILL. I merely want to see the bill before it shall be suffered to be read again. I want one day's time.

Mr. VOORHEES. I want to know where it puts the bill.

Mr. MORRILL. It leaves the bill on the table to be read again to-morrow.

Mr. VOORHEES. Is that all?

Mr. MORRILL. That is all.

THE FUNDING BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 4592) to facilitate the refunding of the national debt.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. HARRIS in the chair.) The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERRY] to the amendment of the Committee on Finance.

Mr. FERRY. I share in the desire expressed by the honorable chairman of the Committee on Finance that we should arrive at a vote at the earliest possible moment on this bill; therefore, I shall forego saying what I intended to say upon the merits of the bill, but will simply say in behalf of the amendment which I have offered that it places the bonds on the same basis as the Treasury notes. The bill as reported by the Finance Committee gives the discretion to the Secretary of the Treasury to place the Treasury notes at not exceeding 3½ per cent. My amendment to the amendment makes the same provision, and gives the same discretion to the Secretary of the Treasury. It does not touch the rate, it simply provides "not exceeding the rate of 3½ per cent."

I have listened with interest to what has been said on this bill, and I have observed that many of the Senators think that these bonds can be placed at a lower rate than 3½ per cent. All such Senators who thus believe should, in my judgment, support the amendment which I have offered. It gives the Secretary of the Treasury the power to place the bonds lower, as he will the Treasury notes.

My judgment, if I were to express it upon the merits of the bill, would be that the Secretary can perhaps place the Treasury notes at less than 3½ per cent. He has the opportunity and the discretion. I wish to give him the same discretion in placing the bonds; so that if the money market favors and the prosperity of the country as indicated by many Senators who have spoken shall be such, then the Secretary of the Treasury will not only have the right, but he will have the opportunity, of placing these bonds at a lower rate than 3½, and certainly every Senator should be anxious to place the bonds of the country at the lowest possible rate.

Mr. McPHERSON. I rise for the purpose of asking the Committee on Finance, who have reported this bill, and also the unanimous consent of the Senate, that no action be taken upon the question of fixing the rate until we determine the time the bonds shall be redeemable and payable. I think there are many Senators whose judgment will be controlled absolutely on the question of the rate per cent. by knowing what the time the bonds are to run is to be. I will therefore ask unanimous consent for the postponement of the vote upon the question of the rate per cent. until we first fix the time which the bonds have to run.

Mr. MORRILL. I will say to the Senator from New Jersey that that is entirely unnecessary, because the bill is now being considered in Committee of the Whole; and if the time fixed for the payment should be unsatisfactory to those who have voted for one rate or another, then the question will come up again.

Mr. McPHERSON. I understand that perfectly well, but at the same time we should then vote understandingly and we can reach a conclusion much earlier than we shall by pursuing any other course. Certainly, so far as I have heard expressions of opinion by Senators, it will be desirable to first fix the time. That having been determined, there certainly then will be but little doubt as to what the opinion of the Senate will be respecting the rate.

Mr. BAYARD. It is perfectly obvious that the two elements, the rate of interest and the time of payment, must be considered together, and they are before the Senate, and gentlemen can make up their minds as to the character of the bond both as to its rate and as to the length of time it has to run; but it is proper to pass upon the rate first. You cannot consider them by the same vote together, because we have amended both the rate of interest and the length of time. I submit to the honorable Senator that nothing then would be gained by considering the length of the bond first in anticipation of the rate of the bond. One must come before the other. They cannot be considered together except as there may be a plan in the mind of every Senator and there seem to be almost as many opinions as there are Senators.

Mr. McPHERSON. I understand it to be the policy of the Senate and I understand it to have been the rule adopted at the commencement of the consideration of this bill that the amendments offered by the Finance Committee should be first considered. The honorable Senator from Michigan, a member of that committee—whether speaking for the committee or not we are not advised—now offers an amendment to the text of the bill other than the amendments offered by the committee.

Mr. BAYARD. It is an amendment to an amendment.

Mr. McPHERSON. It does not appear as an amendment to the amendment, because it is an amendment to the text of the bill, entirely outside of any amendment the committee have offered.

Mr. FERRY. The rule has a reason for it. My amendment affects the amendment of the committee; otherwise it has no force whatever.

Mr. KERNAN. It qualifies it.

Mr. FERRY. The Senator from New York has given the point exactly; it qualifies and modifies the committee's amendment, puts it within the bounds of the judgment of many Senators on this floor, and that being the case it must necessarily be considered with the amendment of the committee, and having submitted to the Chair, the Chair, I doubt not, so considered it, for he has entertained it; and I think the objection of the Senator from New Jersey now is too late.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that while the amendment proposed by the Senator from Michigan does not affect the language of the amendment reported by the committee, it does qualify and modify that amendment, and for that reason alone the Chair entertained it as being an amendment to the amendment because it did affect the amendment proposed by the committee.

Mr. McPHERSON. That is very true, Mr. President, but at the same time would not any amendment offered to the text of the bill qualify or modify in some sense or form the full intent and meaning of the committee's report? I take it that no amendment could be offered of any shape or character that would not to a greater or less extent modify the bill as amended by the committee.

Mr. KERNAN. Does the Senator raise any question of order?

Mr. McPHERSON. It is a question of order.

Mr. KERNAN. The Chair has decided it. Does the Senator wish to take an appeal?

Mr. McPHERSON. I wish to know in this connection whether the Committee on Finance accept the amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan as the act of the committee?

Mr. KERNAN. The chairman said they did not.

Mr. McPHERSON. I did not understand that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Michigan to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. ALLISON. I cannot permit a vote to be taken on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Michigan without entering my individual protest against it. I think that we are proceeding on this bill upon an entirely false basis. We are assuming here that we can by legislation fix a Procrustean bed for these bonds and make a rate of interest that will just provide a bond at par. It makes no difference whether this bond on its face provides for a 3½ per cent. rate of interest or whether it provides for a 3 per cent. rate, if you have an honest man and a faithful man in the office of the Secretary of the Treasury to administer this law. I have already proposed an amendment by which these bonds shall be sold first upon sealed bids in installments, or in numbers such as the market will take from time to time. Now, if the money market will secure more than par for these bonds they will be so sold, and the proceeds will go into the Treasury for the redemption of the bonds maturing.

The proposition of the Senator from Michigan is that these bonds shall be sold at a rate not exceeding 3½ per cent. How is that rate to be tested by the Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. FERRY. Will the Senator allow me to answer that?

Mr. ALLISON. I want to answer it myself first, and then I will allow the Senator to make another answer.

How is that to be tested? He proposes a loan at 3 per cent.; he is tied down in this bill to the sale of a 3 per cent. bond at par. The words "at par" are the controlling words in this bill. No Secretary of the Treasury can sell these bonds at a less price than par. He offers the loan at 3 per cent. Suppose $20,000,000 are sold at par at 3 per cent.? Then suddenly the rate of interest by some machinery here or elsewhere reduces the 3 per cent. bonds so that they sell in the market at one-eighth of 1 per cent. below par, as I mentioned yesterday. The Secretary of the Treasury then cannot sell another bond at 3 per cent., and he is compelled then to put out another loan at a different rate, and so on.

If these bonds are offered for sale at 3½ per cent. or 3¼ per cent., as intimated by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] then the bonds sell at par, and if they are worth more than par in the market they will bring a premium. I will say to the Senator that I was very much struck to-day with the statement made by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] with reference to the provision in the paragraph relating to the $300,000,000 of Treasury notes. There is a discretion left in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury by which he can sell those notes at a rate of interest not exceeding 3½ per cent. Suppose a Secretary comes into the Treasury Department who believes it a wise thing to sell the Treasury notes immediately by an inflation of the currency. The lower the rate he fixes for the Treasury notes the more certain they are to float in the market as currency. They may go out for the time being at par, but they may soon be at less than par.

I think the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON] intimated that they would float even if the interest was put at 1 per cent. Of course they would float at 1 per cent. We can issue if we choose to issue $300,000,000 of Treasury notes or at least $100,000,000 of Treasury notes payable within a reasonably short time and float them all at par for the time being. The question we are considering here is not whether we shall inflate the currency, not whether we shall find a Secretary of the Treasury who will bull and bear the market at his pleasure, but we are providing here a loan bill, a bill disconnected with national banks, disconnected with the inflation or contraction of the currency, related only to those questions in so far as it fixes a reasonable and fair rate of interest for money that seeks investment.

As is suggested to me by the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DAVIS,] who knows more about banks and bankers than I do, the bankers may combine and compel the Secretary to issue a 3½ per cent. rate. Then another class of men may combine, too, with a view to have another result, to wit: that class of wise men who seem to know that in this country a 3 per cent. bond can be sold at par, when there is no such bond in existence to-day in any civilized country on the globe, and no civilized government in Europe or on this continent has ever yet negotiated at par a 3 per cent. bond.

Mr. McPHERSON. How does the honorable Senator know that the bonds will sell at a premium?

Mr. ALLISON. I do not know that they will sell at a premium.

Mr. McPHERSON. If they are worth a premium, these three-and-a-half percents will sell at a premium, I understood the Senator to say.

Mr. ALLISON. Undoubtedly if worth a premium they will sell at a premium. The money market controls the value of bonds. Can the Senator from New Jersey not understand that?

Take the 4 per cent. bonds. For a time they were below par; for months they were below par. What was it that controlled the value of those bonds? It was the money market. Does anybody doubt that our money market is better to-day than it was two years ago?

Of course this is a favorable time for the negotiation of this loan. The question for us fairly to consider is, what is the fair, reasonable rate of interest at which the money market will take $671,000,000 of bonds?

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Let us fix it absolutely.

Mr. ALLISON. I agree with the Senator from Illinois, who prompts me, and I thank him for it. Let us agree upon a reasonable rate of interest, fix that rate absolutely, making it certain that the bonds will not sell below par, and then trust to receiving a small premium if they will secure a premium. I think if there is any one thing settled in the history of our country and the traditions of our people, it is that these bonds should be made redeemable within a reasonably short length of time, that we should have the control of them in our own discretion; and when we seek to do that we must expect that we shall pay a little higher rate of interest than we should be obliged to pay if we postponed the time of payment for thirty or fifty years. This Government of ours has never except in two instances procrastinated a loan beyond twenty years. When we refunded the debt of the Revolution it was made a debt payable at the pleasure of the Government after twelve years. We went through the war of 1812-'14 with a provision for a bond redeemable at the pleasure of the Government after twelve years. During the Mexican war of 1846-'47 the longest bond we issued was a twenty-year bond; and during the great rebellion of 1861-'65, when our ascertained debt reached the enormous amount of $2,700,000,000, every dollar of that debt was within our control except the portion issued to the Pacific railroads. We issued to them a bond running for thirty years. That bond is to-day over 120 in the market. In 1870, by the refunding act, we provided for 4 per cent. bonds that should run for thirty years.

I say, then, it is the fixed policy of the Government to make its loans redeemable, not at the pleasure of the holder of the loan, but at the pleasure of the Government itself. Why? Because our policy is as rapidly as we can to extinguish the debt. It is not the popular belief here that a public debt is a public blessing, but rather that it is an evil, and that it should be extinguished as rapidly as it can be extinguished, taking into account the necessary ability of the people to pay taxes, so that taxation on the people shall not be burdensome or oppressive.

These are the considerations which the Committee on Finance yielded to when they said this bond should run for a short period of time. It matters not, as the Senator from Missouri very well said, whether it is a five to twenty years bond or a five to one hundred years bond; the question is when this bond shall be placed within the control and power of the Government, and that power and control under the bill now before us will be had in five years from this time; and, if I mistake not, if we continue in the prosperous condition we are now in, nearly the whole of these bonds will pass from public view before ten years will have expired. In that time the sinking fund alone will require $520,000,000. Taking into account this short time of payment, I do not believe that it is safe for us as practical men to fix a rate of interest which may put the success of this loan under the control of men who are hostile to it, who do not wish it to succeed, and thus these bonds may be forced below par, in which event they cannot be sold at all.

Mr. McPHERSON. We have not fixed the time the bonds shall run as yet.

Mr. ALLISON. But, as many Senators have expressed their views on the subject, I believe all concur in the belief that this loan should be within a short period of time under the control of the Government; and I say if that be true—and I think it is the general judgment and sense of the Senate—then we must expect to pay something for that privilege. I do not know certainly whether it should be a half per cent. or a fourth more or less; I only say that I want to fix a reasonable rate, one that will make it certain that we can sell the bonds at par, and then if the money market will take them at a lower rate of interest than that named in the bill a faithful Secretary of the Treasury will sell the bonds at a premium. Therefore I regret that my colleague on the committee [Mr. FERRY] has thrown in here what I consider, as I did consider in committee, a damaging discretion in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury, and one that will certainly embarrass him, and one that will at once invoke combinations of capitalists and bankers against him, and thus he will be compelled to put out the loan in a way that will either not secure the sanction of public judgment or cause the loan itself to be a failure.

I do not wish to embarrass the committee; and I see I am overruled in my judgment and opinion by my associates, in the judgment of many of whom I have great faith; yet I shall regret exceedingly to see us fixing the rate of interest here upon a sliding scale, and placing that power in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury. I would rather fix a rate, and let that rate go to the people of this country, and if they want this loan at a higher rate of interest they will pay a premium for it. I wish to see a provision put upon this bill that will compel any and every Secretary of the Treasury to give the people of this country and every part of it a fair and legitimate opportunity to bid for this loan.

Mr. FERRY. Mr. President, if the argument of the Senator from Iowa applies to my amendment, certainly it must apply to the same amendment that was made in committee, for which he and I voted. As to the notes, it is disclosing nothing to say that, because this subject has been reported by the committee. The same amendment that I have offered as to the bonds was adopted by the committee as to the Treasury notes. I do not agree with the Senator from Iowa that the placing of these bonds is in the hands of the money-lenders. The reasons why I voted for the amendment as to the Treasury notes lead me to make the same application to the bonds. Why? Because in my judgment the bonds can be placed at a lower rate than 3½, and yet I so far surrender my judgment as to withhold the views which I intended to express on this question, and defer to the apparent judgment of the Senate. At the same time I do not wish to cripple or tie the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury.

When the Senator from Iowa states that this is an unsafe power to lodge in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury, I merely recall his attention to the fact that we have had two distinguished Secretaries of the Treasury who have exercised this very discretionary power. Secretary Chase did it, and the present Secretary of the Treasury did it; and if common rumor is to be credited we may have the pleasure of seeing that very Senator himself exercising this discretionary power; and certainly we know that he possesses the honesty and fidelity to which he has alluded as necessary elements in the character of any Secretary of the Treasury.

This amendment of mine strengthens the bill. If there is any force in what the Senator has said, I should hope that he would move to strike this feature from the Treasury notes, for the Treasury notes alone are that form of credit which will tend to inflate the currency, if that result can be apprehended at all. These notes are redeemable within one year and payable in five. The bonds to which I am striving to apply this amendment are not redeemable until the expiration of five years, and not payable until ten, if the amendment of the committee is adopted by the Senate. So there can be no application of the objections now made to my amendment that does not apply with equal or greater force to the provision of the committee as to the bonds.

My object is to conform to the intimations by Senators who have spoken upon this bill. Many of them have expressed—the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] has expressed—the view that the bonds can be placed at 3½ per cent. My amendment will enable the Secretary of the Treasury to place them at 3½, and when Senators know that the Secretary of the Treasury and the Government are not compelled to fund the bonds now largely in the hands of the bankers, that we are not forced to fund them, I think they will see the propriety of the amendment. The Government was never in a better condition to fund the fives and sixes than now, because the Secretary of the Treasury can take his own time, watch the market, and place them when he can. If any combination of bankers or capitalists is made, he can break that combination by withholding the bonds. So the matter is not in their hands; it is in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury; and if we confide the purse to any man, we should confide the discretion in the exercise of the interests of that purse. It is with that view that I have offered the amendment, and I have no fear that even if the Senator from Iowa becomes the next Secretary, but that he will faithfully and honestly execute that trust, and if there is any combination against him by the money-lenders in Wall street, he will, as I have stated, withhold the placing of the loan until that combination is broken and place the bonds whenever they can be placed at a low rate of interest.

Mr. TELLER, (at five o'clock and fifteen minutes p. m.) I do not want to interfere with this bill, but if we are going to "sit it out" we had better know it, and for the purpose of testing the sense of the Senate I move that we take a recess under the rule.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. If we are going to pass a funding bill let us stay here to-night and do it. Appropriation bills will come up to-morrow. This subject has been discussed to death, literally to death, and how many new ideas have been given forth to the Senate I will not undertake to say. Let us vote. Every man in the Senate has made up his mind upon this bill; let us vote some time or other to-night; but I do protest against taking a recess and coming back again to-night. It is our duty to the Government to pass some funding bill now, and to stay here until it is passed. Why, sir, gentlemen can pair and go away; but for them to do so is not fair to their compeers. I do insist that we shall stay here until some funding bill is passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Debate on this motion can be indulged in only by unanimous consent. It is not a debatable motion. The Senator from Colorado moves that the Senate do now take a recess under the rule until half past seven o'clock this evening.

Mr. BAYARD. I hope not.

Mr. VOORHEES. I ask the Senate to allow me to say a word. I hope that by unanimous consent we may dispose of the funding bill to-day; and when I say that, there is nobody interested in something else more than I am. I think we had better go on and dispose of the bill now before the Senate by a vote. After that I shall have my fight out with everything else that antagonizes the Library bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Colorado, that the Senate do now take a recess until half past seven this evening.

The motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERRY] to the amendment of the Committee on Finance.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BAYARD. I wish to make one reply to the idea that by a very low rate of interest the bonds proposed under this bill can be turned into currency and have all the effects and results of ordinary United States notes. That is the bugbear, if I may so say, that has been held up, that by refunding this debt at a very low rate of interest you will produce a gigantic measure of inflation as if you would issue so many notes payable on demand without interest.

Mr. President, consider the reasonableness of this statement. To-day we have $79,000,000 of national-bank currency so called, which awaits the pleasure of the banks provided they can use it profitably; and it is already secured; the bonds are deposited in the Treasury for it, and they can call for that money whenever they please, and in the last twelve months that amount has been increased about ten or twelve million dollars. Such is the report of the Comptroller of the Currency, that at their will the national banks can to-day increase their currency some $79,000,000 if they see fit. Why do they not see fit? Because there is no demand for it. The commercial exigencies of the country do not make that currency profitable, and therefore it stays in the hands of the Government unissued.

Now see the proposition that because there is a discretion which may enable the Government to sell these certificates or notes at a less rate than 3½ per cent., ergo they will be sold for 1½ or 2 per cent., and the rate of interest being low your notes will become currency and will no longer be investments. Is not this the reductio ad absurdum? We are told on the one hand that there is employment for money in the shape of investment for Government securities, and then we are told that if your Government securities are floating at an exceedingly low rate the Government will get money for nothing at all and its notes will be turned into currency in active use.

Mr. ALLISON. I hope the Senator from Delaware does not mean that I made any such suggestion.

Mr. BAYARD. I will say frankly that I was surprised when my friend rose in opposition to this amendment. I had the impression, gathered I know not how, that I was to withdraw the objection to it in deference to his opinion and that of others that the same language "not exceeding 3½ per cent." which had been adopted by the committee after deliberation in regard to the United States certificates or Treasury notes could safely be adopted in regard to the bonds. If there is the danger apprehended by my honorable friend from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] it is the same in regard to the bonds as the certificates for both are in fact obligations of the Government to pay a debt at different dates with interest from the date of issue.

Mr. LOGAN. Is the Senator speaking of the amendment of the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. BAYARD. The Senator from Michigan moves to apply the same language to the bonds, the five-twenties, as is recommended by the committee in regard to the Treasury notes.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator will remember that one of the points I made against the bill was that there was a sliding scale to either. I object to a sliding scale at all.

Mr. BAYARD. The Senator is perfectly consistent. He made his objection to there being what he terms a sliding scale as to the rate of interest, and he thought we might reduce the interest so low that the note would not be held for its interest but would pass into currency in the hands of the holders. I have been unable to see that. I have been unable to see how any harm can come to the people of this country by borrowing their money at 1 or 2 per cent. per annum in preference to 3; but I do not believe it practicable, and it is for that reason that I have stuck to 3½ per cent. and expect to vote for it.

I believe I have stated heretofore that if 3½ per cent. does make a security that will sell for more than par, the Treasury will get the benefit of it by sale; and I also stated that I believed it was a solecism in the history of this Government to issue a bond with this discretionary power attached to it; but when I was told by those who are on terms with the Treasury to enable them to know—told here on the floor of the Senate—that the words "not exceeding" would not embarrass the Secretary, would not diminish in the least the power to control the issuing of these bonds, and was told that the amendment would strengthen the rate per cent. that we consider essential for the safety of the Government, I then yielded my opinion and said I should make no further objection; but I wish to say now that if gentlemen pursue the reason to its logical conclusion, if the lower the rate the Government can borrow at the more certain it is to produce inflation, then it seems to me you are only issuing paper for all your debt.

Mr. LOGAN. I should like to say to the Senator from Delaware, inasmuch as he referred to what I said, that a portion of his remarks does not apply to what I said. My objection to the reduction of the rate of interest was not as he thinks it was, but I will state my reason and the Senator can say whether or not in his opinion it is plausible. If I have bonds to sell and I know that the Senator is empowered to purchase will he not as a purchaser hold off until I am forced to sell at the higher rate of interest before he concludes to purchase?

Mr. BAYARD. If that be so, the effect of inserting these words would be mere brutum fulmen, they would mean nothing, because the purchaser of the bonds would wait until the three-and-a-half percents were offered and would not propose to take them at the lower rate.

Mr. LOGAN. That is exactly the point I suggested, that they would naturally be sold at 3½ per cent. if this sliding scale was put in. I say the effect of it would be to force the Secretary of the Treasury, whoever he may be—I do not know who he will be—to sell at the highest rate. I prefer to fix the rate here. Then we shall know exactly what we are doing. I would rather not give my vote to enable any Secretary of the Treasury to meet possible contingencies, and to hold this power in his hands to sell bonds at different rates of interest. Hence I said I was for a bond at 3½ per cent.; I would fix it in the bill, and I would fix the rate on the Treasury notes at 3 per cent.

That was my proposition, for the reason that the note proposed is really nothing more than currency. You may call it a bond, if you choose, but if issued it will go into circulation as currency whether you fix the rate of interest upon it at 3 per cent. or 3½, and you can float just as many notes at 3 per cent. as you can at 3½. The view of the Senator from Delaware seems to be that if a low rate of interest is fixed the notes will go into circulation, but if a higher rate is fixed they will not. I do not think there is much in that. I think a $10 note, a $20 note, a $50 note, and a $100 note issued under this bill will all go into the circulation as currency whether you fix the interest at 3 per cent. or 3½ per cent., and hence I prefer 3 per cent.

Mr. ALLISON. I only desire to say one word in response to the Senator from Delaware, the chairman of the Committee on Finance. I think the Senator will bear me witness that on every occasion—I will not name any particular occasion—I have opposed this discretion of "not exceeding 3½ per cent." He did come to my desk a few moments since and say that he thought we had better yield that point. I did not give my assent to or express my dissent from his statement, because I did not suppose that this amendment of the Senator from Michigan could be voted upon for some little time and I did not presume that at this time we should be confronted with that question. My judgment is against it and that is all I have to say. Of course if I misled the Senator from Delaware, I regret it; but having a distinct judgment upon the question I did not like to see a vote taken without expressing that conviction in the Senate.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Now, Mr. President, I hope we shall have a vote on these amendments one at a time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERRY] to the amendment of the Committee on Finance.

Mr. McPHERSON. I am not disposed to vote on this question either to-night or to-morrow or the next week, until it is thoroughly and entirely understood. There are some questions here that I fail to understand if the committee are right. The honorable Senator from Iowa wishes to know if I cannot understand a plain financial proposition. I think I can; but there are some propositions that come to us from the committee that I certainly cannot understand, and one of the propositions is this: the honorable Senator from Michigan, a member of the Committee on Finance, is audacious enough to offer an amendment to the committee's bill. The honorable chairman of the committee and the honorable Senator from Iowa say he is not authorized by the committee to offer any such amendment, they do not accept it as the amendment of the committee. In reply to a question submitted to the Senator from Iowa by me he admits its force but says, "I expect to meet that difficulty by the amendment I have offered." Will that honorable Senator tell me whether the committee have instructed him to report an amendment, and whether he will not be guilty of exactly the same discourtesy to the committee that the Senator from Michigan has been?

Mr. ALLISON. There is no question of discourtesy, and I will answer the Senator; it was the opinion of the committee that what my amendment provides for was clearly provided for in the bill as reported; but criticism having been made upon it I submitted my amendment, so that there might be no question with reference to the price to be paid for the bonds; so that even a wayfaring man might not make a mistake.

Mr. McPHERSON. Mr. President——

Mr. FERRY. The Senator will not say I have practiced a discourtesy to the committee. I offered this amendment in my own behalf as a Senator; it was my right.

Mr. McPHERSON. I so understand.

Mr. FERRY. I did not do it until amendments had been offered to the bill, one or more, and further, until an amendment had been offered by a member of the committee; so that the Senator is a little too exacting, if not severe, in implying that I was guilty of any discourtesy to the committee by offering my amendment.

Mr. McPHERSON. I did not charge it at all; I was only repeating what the committee had charged.

There is another point I should like to have the Senator from Iowa answer me upon.

Mr. VOORHEES. Will the Senator from New Jersey allow me to ask, why not let us vote on the question that is pending before the Senate, and that is the rate of interest, and then we shall know where we stand?

Mr. McPHERSON. I wish to ask the Senator from Iowa one question before we vote on this amendment. I find in the report of the Comptroller of the Currency that there was an agreement entered into between the Secretary of the Treasury and Jay Cooke for the sale of $200,000,000 of 4 and 4½ per cent. bonds. There was a subsequent agreement entered into with A. Belmont & Company for the sale of $300,000,000 of bonds; and there was a subsequent agreement entered into with a syndicate, as it was called—it is not stated who composed the syndicate—for the sale of 4 per cent. bonds authorized by the refunding act of 1870.

During the first four months of 1879 $497,000,000 of four percents were disposed of, of which more than $149,000,000 were sold at a premium of one-half of 1 per cent. Here is the particular point to which I wish to call the Senator's attention: of this amount $121,000,000 were taken by the First National Bank of New York and its associates; I know nothing about who were the associates of the First National Bank of New York; I have heard a great deal of suspicion expressed; and the balance of the $149,000,000, to wit, $28,000,000, were given to all other banks. Upon these bonds the First National Bank paid one-half of 1 per cent. premium, while one-half of 1 per cent. discount had been allowed up to that time on all sales to syndicates; but the Secretary of the Treasury took it from syndicates and gave it to a pet institution in the city of New York, at one-half of 1 per cent. premium, and he gave to all the other financial institutions only $28,000,000 out of the $149,000,000 issued.

Now, sir, another fact. Within thirty days after the First National Bank of New York had obtained the ownership of these bonds at a premium of one-half of 1 per cent., the value of the bonds was 2½ per cent. above the price paid by the First National Bank; and yet the honorable Senator from Iowa informs me that he will introduce his amendment which will compel the Secretary of the Treasury to allot these bonds by proposals in the open market. Why, Mr. President, it does seem to me as though the honorable Senator does not mean all he says with respect to that. I cannot conceive how any member of the Senate can vote to put into the hands of any Secretary or any other man the power to issue $400,000,000 of bonds and to fix the rate of interest on them at 3½ per cent. or any rate lower than 3½ that suits him. He may "bear" the bonds or "bull" the bonds as he pleases up to 3½ per cent. If you adopt this amendment, I think the rate per cent. will be 3½ whatever discretion you give to the Secretary of the Treasury, and the words of the amendment offered by the honorable Senator from Michigan mean simply nothing. Perhaps it will deceive somebody: it may deceive some Senator with respect to what may be the result if these words are incorporated in the bill; but the meaning is simply, if the Secretary of the Treasury is to issue a bond at 3½ per cent. interest or less, that it will be sold at 3½ per cent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERRY] to the amendment of the committee.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. RANDOLPH, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. WITHERS.] I should vote "nay" if he were present.

Mr. RANSOM, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] on all amendments to this bill. If he were present, I should vote "nay" on this particular question.

Mr. GARLAND, (when Mr. THURMAN'S name was called.) The Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] is paired with the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HAMLIN.]

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. HOAR. My colleague [Mr. DAWES] is paired with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BAILEY] on the bill generally. I do not know how either of them would vote on this special amendment.

Mr. PENDLETON. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. THURMAN] is paired with the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HAMLIN.]

The result was announced—yeas 12, nays 46; as follows:

YEAS—12.

| | | | |
|---|---|---|---|
| Anthony, | Ferry, | Kirkwood, | Paddock, |
| Baldwin, | Groome, | McMillan, | Pendleton, |
| Cameron of Wis., | Hoar, | Morrill, | Windom. |

NAYS—46.

| Conkling, | Jones of Florida, | Thurman, | |

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the amendment of the Committee on Finance, in line 18 of section 1, after the word "three," to insert "and one-half," upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. EATON. I desire simply to give notice that in the Senate I shall offer an amendment to this amendment of the committee.

Mr. McPHERSON. We are now to vote on the words "and one-half," I understand.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Committee on Finance to insert the words "and one-half" after "three."

Mr. McPHERSON. I hope that will not be agreed to.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BUTLER, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Nevada, [Mr. JONES.] If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. HOAR, (when Mr. DAWES'S name was called.) My colleague [Mr. DAWES] is paired with the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. BAILEY.] If he were present, my colleague would vote "yea" on this amendment.

Mr. MORRILL, (when Mr. EDMUNDS'S name was called.) My colleague [Mr. EDMUNDS] is paired with the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. RANSOM.] If he were present, my colleague would vote in favor of the amendment proposed.

Mr. PLUMB, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. WHYTE.] If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. RANDOLPH, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. WITHERS.] I should vote "yea" and he would vote "nay" if he were present.

Mr. RANSOM, (when his name was called.) As has just been announced, I am paired with the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.] If he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. PUGH, (when Mr. THURMAN'S name was called.) I am requested to announce that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] is paired with the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HAMLIN.]

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. BRUCE, (after having voted in the affirmative.) I desire to withdraw my vote. I am paired with the Senator from Florida, [Mr. JONES,] and voted inadvertently. Were he here he would vote "nay," and I should vote "yea."

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 22, nays 34; as follows:

YEAS—22.

| | | | |
|---|---|---|---|
| Allison, | Cameron of Wis., | Hoar, | Paddock, |
| Anthony, | Davis of Illinois, | Kernan, | Platt, |

| Cameron of Pa., | Hamlin, | Ransom, | Withers. |

So the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the next amendment of the Committee on Finance.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 19 of section 1, after the words "per annum," the committee report to insert "payable semi-annually;" so as to read "which shall bear interest at the rate of 3 per cent. per annum, payable semi-annually."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was, in section 1, line 20, after the word "payable," to strike out "ten" and insert "twenty;" so as to read "redeemable, at the pleasure of the United States, after five years, and payable twenty years from the date of issue."

Mr. McPHERSON. I move to strike out "twenty" before "years" and insert "thirty;" and I shall ask for the yeas and nays upon that question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey to the amendment of the Committee on Finance, on which the yeas and nays are demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary called the roll.

Mr. BRUCE. I am paired with the Senator from Florida, [Mr. JONES.] Were he here, I should vote "nay." I do not know how he would vote.

The result was announced—yeas 14, nays 44; as follows:

YEAS—14.

| | | | |
|---|---|---|---|
| Booth, | Grover, | Lamar, | Pugh, |
| Butler, | Harris, | McPherson, | Vance, |

| Carpenter, | Hamlin, | Thurman, | |

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the amendment of the committee, to strike out "ten" and insert "twenty."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was, in section 1, line 21, after the word "also," to strike out "certificates in the" and insert "Treasury notes to an;" and in line 22, after the word "amount," to strike out "of" and insert "not exceeding;" so as to read "and also Treasury notes to an amount not exceeding $300,000,000."

Mr. LOGAN. Before the vote is taken on that amendment, I presume it would be in order to perfect the text of the bill as we go along. If this is the proper time to do that, I propose in line 16 to strike out "four" and insert "seven;" so as to read "to an amount not exceeding seven hundred millions;" with a view to moving to strike out in line 21 the words which apply to the $300,000,000 Treasury notes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of opinion that the amendments of the committee must be acted on first. The bill will then still be in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment. The question is upon the amendment reported by the Committee on Finance.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was, in line 23 of section 1, after the word "ten," to strike out the words "twenty and fifty;" and in line 24, after the word "dollars," to insert "or some multiple of that sum not exceeding $1,000;" so as to read "and also Treasury notes to an amount not exceeding $300,000,000, in denominations of $10, or some multiple of that sum not exceeding $1,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was, in line 25 of section 1, after the words "interest at," to strike out "the" and insert "a;" and in line 26, after the word "rate," to strike out "of" and insert "not exceeding;" so as to read "either registered or coupon, bearing interest at a rate not exceeding."

Mr. PLUMB. I ask for the yeas and nays on that amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BAYARD. I think the amendment cannot be intelligently considered unless it is viewed in connection with the one that follows it. In line 26 the proposition of the committee is that the Treasury notes shall bear interest at a rate not exceeding 3½ per cent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary did not report the amendment so as to include "3½ per cent.," in line 26; but he will now report the whole amendment, including the language referred to.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 25, after the word "at," it is proposed to strike out "the" and insert "a;" in line 26, after "rate," strike out "of" and insert "not exceeding;" and after the word "three," in the same line, insert "and one-half;" so as to read "bearing interest at a rate not exceeding 3½ per cent. per annum."

Mr. McDONALD. Is the proposition divisible?

Several SENATORS. No, no. Let us vote.

Mr. McDONALD. I want to vote for one part of the amendment but not for the other part of it.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. The Senator can move an amendment to it afterward.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana demand a decision of the question, and ask whether the amendment is divisible or not?

Mr. McDONALD. No, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Finance Committee, which has been reported, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. PLUMB, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. WHYTE.] If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. RANSOM, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.] If he were here, he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. BUTLER, (after having voted in the affirmative.) I beg to withdraw my vote. I am paired with the Senator from Nevada, [Mr. JONES.] If he were present, I should vote "yea." I voted under a misapprehension, forgetting that I was paired.

Mr. HOAR. My colleague [Mr. DAWES] is paired with the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. BAILEY.]

Mr. BRUCE. I am paired with the Senator from Florida, [Mr. JONES.] Were he here, I should vote "yea" and he would vote "nay."

Mr. RANDOLPH. I am paired on this question with the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. WITHERS.]

The result was announced—yeas 21, nays 34; as follows:

YEAS—21.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. McDONALD. Would it be in order now to move to amend the text of the bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Not until after the amendments of the Committee on Finance have been acted upon. The next amendment of the committee will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 1, line 27, after the words "per annum," it is proposed to insert "payable semi-annually;" so as to read "three per cent. per annum, payable semi-annually."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was, in section 1, line 29, after the word "issue," to insert "and no Treasury note of a less denomination than $100 shall be registered."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was, in section 1, line 31, after the words "bonds and," to strike out "certificates" and insert "Treasury notes;" so as to read:

The bonds and Treasury notes shall be, in all other respects, of like character and subject to the same provisions as the bonds authorized to be issued by the act of July 14, 1870, entitled "An act to authorize the refunding of the national debt," and acts amendatory thereto.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was, in section 1, line 40, before the word "notice," to insert "publication of;" so as to read:

That interest upon the 6 per cent. bonds hereby authorized to be refunded shall cease at the expiration of thirty days after publication of notice that the same have been designated by the Secretary of the Treasury for redemption.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was, in section 2, line 4, after the words "bonds or," to strike out "certificates" and insert "Treasury notes;" so as to read:

To exchange at not less than par any of the bonds or Treasury notes herein authorized for any of the bonds of the United States outstanding and uncalled bearing a higher rate of interest than 4½ per cent. per annum.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB. I should like to call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Finance to the text of the bill in section 2. In line 6 reference is made to the outstanding and uncalled bonds, and in line 10 the word "maturity" is used. The Secretary in that clause is authorized to pay "the difference between the interest on such bonds from the date of exchange to the time of their maturity."

Mr. BAYARD. That is the maturity optional with the United States; they can take the bonds matured by calling them in.

Mr. PLUMB. But if the Senator will permit me, this clause refers to bonds for which no time for maturity has been fixed either by law or by the Department. The law fixes no date of maturity; as they are uncalled bonds merely, and as the Treasury Department has fixed no time for maturity, it leaves it entirely loose, with a very wide discretion in the Secretary of the Treasury as to the time he shall allow this double interest.

Mr. BAYARD. No, I do not think that the section is open to that construction. In the first place, the Senator will observe that the two lines to which he calls attention are entirely separated in sense. Lines 4, 5, and 6 read:

Any of the bonds or Treasury notes herein authorized for any of the bonds of the United States outstanding and uncalled bearing a higher rate of interest than 4½ per cent. per annum.

That is, the Secretary can exchange them. Then further, beginning in line 7:

And on the bonds so redeemed the Secretary of the Treasury may allow to the holders the difference between the interest on such bonds from the date of exchange to the time of their maturity.

Mr. PLUMB. What is the date of their maturity, if the Senator please? They are described as "uncalled bonds," and there is no date of maturity fixed in the statute. They are the uncalled bonds of the United States; and consequently, as the calling for them fixes no date of maturity, there is no date of maturity.

Mr. BAYARD. I think if the Senator will look at line 10 of the section he will see that there is no such construction to be put upon it. "The interest on such bonds from the date of exchange to the time of their maturity," is the language.

Mr. PLUMB. It reads "from the date of exchange to the date of maturity;" and the point I make is that no date of maturity is fixed. This clause relates not to the sale of bonds, but to the exchange of one class of bonds for another; and if the time overlaps, double interest is paid.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would state to the Senator from Kansas that his suggestion being in reference to a modification of the text of the bill, the Senate will proceed to act on the amendments of the Committee on Finance, and when they have been gone through with the bill will be open to further amendment.

Mr. BAYARD. I think in fact there is no bond of the United States bearing more than 4½ per cent. interest that does not mature at the option of the United States by the 1st of July.

Mr. PLUMB. But how is the option to be exercised except by a call? And this refers distinctly to the uncalled bonds; that is, to bonds as to which the Government has not given notice of its intention to exercise its option.

Mr. BAYARD. After we go through the amendments of the committee, the honorable Senator can propose an amendment which he thinks will guard against such a construction as he suggests.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next amendment will be reported.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was, in section 2, line 11, after the words "bonds or," to strike out the word "certificates" and insert "Treasury notes."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was, in section 2, line 12, after the word "issued," to strike out the words "but none of the provisions of this act shall apply to the redemption or exchange of any of the bonds issued by the Pacific Railway Companies."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was, in section 2, line 16, after the word "destroyed," to insert "but none of the provisions of this act shall apply to the redemption or exchange of any of the bonds issued to the Pacific Railway Companies."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was, in section 3 to strike out lines 1, 2, and part of line 3, in the words "authority to issue bonds and certificates to the amount necessary to carry out the provisions of this act is hereby granted; and."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was, in section 3, line 5, after the word "effect," to strike out the words "Provided, That" and insert the word "and."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was, in section 3, line 7, after the words "bonds and," to strike out the word "certificate" and insert "Treasury notes."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was, in section 3, line 8, after the word "exceed," to strike out "one-quarter" and insert "one-half;" so as to read "and the expense of preparing, issuing, advertising, and disposing of the bonds and Treasury notes authorized to be issued shall not exceed one-half of 1 per cent."

Mr. INGALLS. I wish the chairman of the committee would state upon what ground it was thought necessary to increase this sum from one-quarter to one-half of 1 per cent. It makes the aggregate of $3,500,000 to be allowed for the expenditures in placing this loan.

Mr. BAYARD. The Senator will find the reason for that stated at length on page 37 of the report of the interview held January 30, 1880.

Mr. INGALLS. Will the Senator state in brief what the reason is?

Mr. BAYARD. There are given the details of the expenses of the funding in 1878 and in 1879; also at page 19 of the published interview with the present Secretary of the Treasury held a few weeks ago he gives a statement of the actual cost, which amounted to about thirty-five hundredths of 1 per cent.

Mr. INGALLS. What were the items of expenditures covered by that sum? My understanding is that in appropriations for this purpose made in previous loans the greater part of the sum has been expended in enriching favorites who were made the recipients of bounty in this way; and unless there can be some reason shown why it does cost $3,500,000 to print these bonds, advertise them, and pay the expenses, I shall be in favor of voting for one-quarter rather than one-half of 1 per cent.

Mr. BAYARD. Perhaps the shortest way would be to read the items of expenditure in the negotiation of 1878 and 1879 of the 4 per cent. consols of 1907. For the entire funding of $740,847,800 there was expended $2,645,892.60, as follows:

|---|---|
| Commissions paid to the syndicate | $386,369 68 |
| Commissions paid under the circulars | 1,563,523 28 |
| Extra force employed | 190,633 82 |
| Extra compensation paid | 9,968 55 |
| Engraving plates and printing bonds and certificates | 308,465 38 |
| Transportation by express, messengers, &c | 163,381 29 |
| Incidental expenses | 23,460 60 |
| Total amount expended | 2,645,892 60 |

Mr. INGALLS. Of which the greater part went in what are called commissions to the syndicate that bought the bonds and to other purchasers.

Mr. BAYARD. Let me say to the Senator that in 1870 it cost the Government $2,500,000 to fund $500,000,000 of 5 per cent. bonds; in 1878 it cost $2,645,000 to fund $740,000,000. In the funding operation by the present Secretary of the Treasury there was a gain of very nearly one-eighth of 1 per cent.; in other words he diminished the cost of refunding 25 per cent. as compared with the history of funding under the administrations of Boutwell, Richardson, and Bristow.

Mr. INGALLS. The amendment reported by the committee allows a larger sum than has been paid at any previous time for any funding operation, to wit, the sum of $3,500,000.

Mr. BAYARD. The proportionate amount has been paid heretofore, and it may reach that amount in case the Secretary finds its use essential in negotiating the loan.

Mr. INGALLS. The cost of funding the previous loan was thirty-five hundredths of 1 per cent., and the expenses are diminished. Why should the committee report in favor of paying fifty hundredths of 1 per cent.? Why should that provision be inserted?

Mr. BAYARD. The amount proposed by the House was less than the most economical funding heretofore could pretend to be done for, and we thought it proper that in an operation of this kind in the hands of a Secretary who had proved that he had saved $1,058,436 out of $3,704,239, it was perfectly safe and right not to run the risk of any embarrassment, but to let him have a sum not exceeding the amount that had been paid for funding the loan of 1870.

Mr. MORRILL. Will the chairman of the Finance Committee allow me to say a single word?

Mr. BAYARD. I have said all I wish to say.

Mr. MORRILL. We were informed that the negotiation attending the first part of making any such refunding would be plump up to one-half of 1 per cent., while there might be a very considerable amount saved in the latter part of the negotiation. In the first place, there is the expense of the plates and all the contingencies for starting the refunding. The bonds will have to be engraved and printed. Under the circumstances it may be deemed proper to leave the amount to the discretion of the Secretary, believing that any Secretary would be under the same necessity of expending a large amount at first, and a much smaller amount toward the end of the negotiation.

Mr. BECK. The reason that induces my action on this question I think I can state in a very few words. Secretary Sherman came before the committee and made a statement. Perhaps I can present it best by reading what the Secretary said:

There is another matter here which I do not wish to omit. The House has reduced the expenses of issuing the bonds to one-fourth of 1 per cent. I know that is founded upon the fact that with the four percents we reduced the expenses to a fraction over a quarter of 1 per cent.

Senator VOORHEES. You speak of the expenses of sale?

Secretary SHERMAN. The entire expenses of sale. I have got some figures here. The fact is that no government in the world, I think, has ever sold its securities at an expense of less than 1 per cent. until in this country, and we have done it by adopting the popular system. The French, you know, paid a great deal in various ways to the Bank of France, and England has always paid high rates, as has also Germany, but in our country but one-half of 1 per cent. is allowed. During the war the allowance on all the loans was 1 per cent. The funding act reduced it to one-half of 1 per cent., and very properly, because that was a refunding operation, and not an original borrowing. Here is a table showing the expenses and the nature of the expenses of disposing of the 4 per cent. loan, with the commissions to the syndicate. The amount paid to the syndicate was $386,000. That was in 1877 and the first of 1878. The commissions, however, paid under circulars to every public subscription amount to $1,563,000. Anybody could come in. For the extra force employed there was paid $190,000; extra compensation paid under the act of Congress for clerks who had to work night and day, $10,000; engraving plates, printing, &c., $308,000; transportation, $163,000; incidental expenses, $23,000. The total amount was $2,645,000. The amount allowed by the House would allow no commissions to banks and bankers.

Now, I cannot state too strongly the importance of such commissions. With it we can enlist the active assistance of all these financial agencies. Without it we would have them against us or indifferent. The small fraction paid them is insignificant compared to the saving to the Government of a prompt and rapid sale of these bonds. This saving is over one million one hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars a month. No one familiar with this business can doubt but that the aid of banks and bankers will expedite these sales several months. When the sales are under full operation we can then deny commissions, as I did with the four percents; but at the commencement of the loan we must offer them some profit or inducement.

Senator KERNAN. That was in disposing of the four percents?

Secretary SHERMAN. In disposing of the four percents. The amount appropriated was $3,704,000, and we saved $1,058,000, but the whole of that saving was in the sale of the last $300,000,000, when we paid no commission at all; the sales got to running so very well.

Senator FERRY. Have you a percentage of cost?

Secretary SHERMAN. No; but I can give it. It was from one-eighth to one-fourth.

Senator FERRY. There is a prejudice in the public mind in regard to the syndicates, that they have been very expensive, and it might be well to have those figures.

Secretary SHERMAN. The syndicate did not get one-seventh of the entire expense.

Senator WALLACE. The commissions paid to the syndicate amounted to $386,000.

Secretary SHERMAN. I say to you that you cannot start this loan on one-fourth of 1 per cent. You have got to follow the usual methods by allowing some commissions on sales.

Then he proceeded to show that while he paid up to one-half of 1 per cent. for handling the 4 per cent. loan at first, he was able to come down at last to nothing, and thereby saved the $1,058,436, of which the Senator from Delaware spoke. He paid no commissions on the last bonds of that loan, but the expenditure was incurred in the beginning of the negotiation.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. He got some premium on the last of those bonds.

Mr. BECK. Yes. I thought in committee, if I have a right to speak of that, and I believe now that he can do it for one-third of 1 per cent. I do not believe he can do it for one-fourth of 1 per cent.; but I do not believe any Secretary we are likely to have will expend more than is absolutely necessary. As the present Secretary has used $1,058,000 less than he was authorized to use, it is some assurance that whoever may succeed him will not spend any more than he is obliged to spend in making the loan.

Mr. KERNAN. I want to read a little of the reasons which induced me to favor this amendment. I read from the recent interview of the Secretary with the Finance Committee:

The amount allowed by the House would allow no commissions to banks and bankers. Now, I cannot state too strongly the importance of such commissions. With it we can enlist the active assistance of all these financial agencies. Without it we would have them against us or indifferent. The small fraction paid them is insignificant compared to the saving to the Government of a prompt and rapid sale of these bonds. This saving is over $1,125,000 a month. No one familiar with this business can doubt but that the aid of banks and bankers will expedite these sales several months. When the sales are under full operation we can then deny commissions, as I did with the four percents; but at the commencement of the loan we must offer them some profit or inducement.

Senator KERNAN. That was in disposing of the four percents.

Secretary SHERMAN. In disposing of the four percents. The amount appropriated was $3,704,000, and we saved $1,058,000, but the whole of that saving was in the sale of the last $300,000,000, when we paid no commission at all; the sales got to running so very well.

Senator FERRY. Have you a percentage of cost?

Secretary SHERMAN. No; but I can give it. It was from one-eighth to one-fourth.

Senator FERRY. There is a prejudice in the public mind in regard to the syndicates, that they have been very expensive, and it might be well to have those figures.

Secretary SHERMAN. The syndicate did not get one-seventh of the entire expense.

Senator WALLACE. The commissions paid to the syndicate amounted to $386,000.

Secretary SHERMAN. I say to you that you cannot start this loan on one-fourth of 1 per cent. You have got to follow the usual methods by allowing some commissions on sales.

Senator VOORHEES. How much is provided by the bill?

Senator ALLISON. The bill provides for one-fourth of 1 per cent.

The CHAIRMAN. You paid no commission on the last $300,000,000.

Secretary SHERMAN. No; simply because it was selling so fast. On that last loan we gave no commission to anybody. The loan was selling fast enough without.

Senator KERNAN. Is this commission anything except to make the discount when they take a certain amount?

Secretary SHERMAN. That is all. We say to the world, "If you come here and take $10,000 of this loan, we will give you a discount of one-eighth of 1 per cent. If you take $1,000,000, we will give you a discount of one-quarter of 1 per cent., and so on."

Senator KERNAN. And toward the last they came so freely that they took them without any discount?

Secretary SHERMAN. On the two last circulars issued under those loans we did not give anything at all. Indeed we raised the rates. We charged them a premium.

The CHAIRMAN. But the average was about three-eighths of 1 per cent.?

Secretary SHERMAN. Yes; but to commence, we must have a half, for the reason that you cannot purchase paper and make orders for engraving and printing for less, but then toward the end we might save.

Senator KERNAN. You would still expect to get through on a quarter of 1 per cent., but you want to begin on one-half?

Secretary SHERMAN. We got through on one-quarter and three-eighths. The transportation is a very large item. This is the statement:

Statement showing the expenses of issuing the 4 per cent. consols of 1907.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, SECRETARY'S OFFICE, July 1, 1880.

The Secretary told us he could not start unless we allowed one-half of 1 per cent. to get the loan moving, so as to do it cheaply.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President, I have but a few words to say on this point. As a member of the committee I was guided by the judgment of the Secretary of the Treasury on this question. I am surprised, and I regret to hear the implied assault made on him by the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. INGALLS.] If we cannot rely upon the word of a Cabinet minister as to what it will cost to put these bonds on the market for sale and meet the expenses of their disposal, we cannot rely upon anything. The gentleman who came before the Committee on Finance and to whom I listened had been three times a member of this body and is for the fourth time elected for six years' service here. He has already served a term as Secretary of the Treasury. He is required to know the expense of this proceeding; I am not required to know; there is not a Senator here who can know as the Secretary of the Treasury is required by law to know. If we have been misled on this question it implies the direst and blackest and most infamous conduct that can befall an officer of this Government.

I do not know whether this engraving and putting to sale of the bonds can be done for less than is provided in the amendment of the committee, and there is not a member of this body who can know. We have to take such a matter on trust, and if the Secretary of the Treasury of the present administration has not willfully misled us, it is a case of supreme ignorance. If he has misled us at all, it adds one more to the sins of omission and commission on the part of the Administration now in power, and little as I am attached to the Administration by political ties and affiliations, I am not willing by my vote to say that the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Sherman, came before the Committee on Finance and there told us what was not true. It is not worth while to say he does not know, for he does know. Consequently, I shall follow the action of the committee, and if I find hereafter that I have been misled by him, I shall take my reprisal whenever I can.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I do not desire, for my part, to cast any censure upon any officer of the Government, nor do I desire to cast censure upon the House of Representatives when they came to the conclusion that one-fourth of 1 per cent. was enough to pay the expense of funding this loan. I find in the interview, or rather the examination and statement of Mr. Sherman, on page 19, which has been referred to this evening, that the sum of $740,847,800 of the 4 per cent. loan was funded by him at an expense of $2,645,802. Of that sum, $386,369 and some cents was commissions paid to the syndicate; $1,563,523, commissions paid under the circulars. Then the rest of the expense was for extra force employed, extra compensation paid, engraving plates and printing bonds and certificates, transportation by express messengers and incidental expenses, making the total $2,645,802.60 paid as commissions or discounts.

Mr. McPHERSON. Is the Senator also aware that the amount fixed by rumor, and pretty well fixed, I think, as having gone to Indiana to control the election in that State, mainly subscribed by this syndicate, was nearly $1,000,000?

Mr. MORGAN. I do not know anything of rumor, and I do not propose to base my remarks on this question upon rumor or political suggestion, because I am trying to consider it entirely aside from all partisan considerations. I believe one-fourth of 1 per cent. is money enough for refunding this loan and I think the testimony of Mr. Sherman in regard to the very large amounts used to fund the four percents is quite sufficient as a guide for our proceeding in this case. Mr. Sherman said in reply to the following question from the Senator from New York, [Mr. KERNAN:]

Is this commission anything except to make the discount when they take a certain amount?

Secretary SHERMAN. That is all. We say to the world, "If you come here and take $10,000 of this loan, we will give you a discount of one-eighth of 1 per cent. If you take $1,000,000, we will give you a discount of one-fourth of 1 per cent., and so on."

The whole of this being a discount, or rather a percentage, to put the bonds in the hands of the purchasers in consideration of the fact that they subscribed for large amounts, the Secretary would not pay this commission to any one who would take $1,000, or perhaps $5,000, altogether in one sum, so that the amount of commission to be paid must necessarily, upon the hypothesis which he states and the theory on which he acted heretofore, go into the hands of large capitalists, who are able to take large amounts of these bonds. In that I think there is striking injustice in the application of this money. When we raise the amount from one-fourth to one-half of 1 per cent., a large part of it is to be expended in commissions, and these commissions are to go to men who have the ability to control large sums of money. That may be a wise policy, so far as credit goes, if we have to induce men by compensating them to add to the value of our credit to take our bonds in this way. Perhaps it is a wise policy, but the circumstances of this case are altogether different from the circumstances which attended the 4 per cent. loan in one particular. This bill provides that $300,000,000 shall be in the form of Treasury notes bearing, as the Senate has now voted, 3 per cent. interest, in sums of ten dollars and multiples thereof, and no Treasury note of a less denomination than $100 shall be registered. Now, we take $300,000,000 out of the category of the subscriptions on which commissions are to be paid, and therefore leave one-half of 1 per cent. to be paid upon $400,000,000 of bonds, for those who take these Treasury notes in ten-dollar sums, or any multiples of ten dollars, will never receive a commission.

We understand that the amount of money to be funded in Treasury notes has to be so funded for the purpose of giving these notes circulation among our own people. No commissions will be paid to them for taking these sums of money. I hope none will ever be paid, even if this amount of money shall be voted to pay commissions, for the reason that I want to see the people get hold of these Treasury notes. I want our people throughout the United States to have the possession of these Treasury notes and whatever benefit may be derived from them, and not one dollar of this commission is expected to be appropriated in putting them out among the people. If we have $300,000,000 taken out of the category upon which commissions are to be paid by the Secretary of the Treasury, where can be the necessity of raising the amount that we are to expend in this way from the fourth of 1 per cent. to the half of 1 per cent?

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] made an observation which leads me to say that if he or anybody else supposed that I had any design of making any assault upon any official of the Treasury, he misapprehends the tenor of my remarks. I said, and I believe that history will carry me out in the statement, that on many previous occasions the expenses of placing loans had been the means of enriching favorites of the Treasury. I am also very thoroughly convinced that in placing the 4 per cent. loan the payment of nearly four hundred thousand dollars to the syndicate who took the bonds was a superfluous and unnecessary payment, and might have been saved to the Government. This arrangement appears to me to be simply a device for the purpose of preventing these bonds from being sold at less than par.

It has not appeared from the statement that has been made by any member of the committee that the actual expenses of placing this loan could be more than one-quarter of 1 per cent., and the rest must necessarily be used for the elastic purpose that goes under the name of "commissions," to be held out as inducements to persons to take the bonds whether they may be private persons or whether they may come under the name of syndicates who have taken them in large amounts. I believe that the amendment of the committee should be rejected.

Mr. McDONALD. As I understand the amendment, the percentage applies to the Treasury notes authorized by the bill, as well as the bonds; and understanding it in that way, I shall vote against the amendment and for the bill in that particular as it passed the House.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. GARLAND in the chair.) The question is on the amendment of the Committee on Finance.

Mr. McPHERSON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. RANSOM, (when his name was called.) On this amendment I am paired with the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.] If he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. WALKER, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Colorado, [Mr. HILL.] If he were present, I should vote "nay."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. LOGAN, (after having voted in the affirmative.) I voted under a misapprehension, and my attention was called to it by the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. RANSOM.] I am paired with his colleague, [Mr. VANCE,] and therefore I withdraw my vote.

Mr. FARLEY. My colleague [Mr. BOOTH] asked me to announce his pair with the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR.] If my colleague were here he would vote "nay."

Mr. PENDLETON. I desire to say that my colleague [Mr. THURMAN] is paired with the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HAMLIN,] and I make this announcement to continue during the whole evening, and will not repeat it.

The result was announced—yeas 30, nays 20; as follows:

YEAS—30.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia, (at six o'clock and fifty-two minutes p. m.) I move that the Senate adjourn. ["No!" "No!"] I withdraw the motion to adjourn, as there is an evident inclination not to do so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion to adjourn is withdrawn, and the next amendment of the Committee on Finance will be reported.

The next amendment was, in section 4, line 3, after the word "use," to insert the word "temporarily."

Mr. TELLER. That amendment ought to be acted on at the same time with the amendments in lines 7, 8, and 9. I call the attention of the chairman of the committee to that. They form one amendment.

Mr. BAYARD. I think the Senator is right.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is also proposed by the Committee on Finance, in line 6 of section 4, after the word "act," to insert "which shall from time to time be repaid and replaced out of the proceeds of the sale of the bonds or Treasury notes authorized by this act;" so as to read:

That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized, if in his opinion it shall become necessary, to use temporarily not exceeding $50,000,000 of the standard gold and silver coin in the Treasury in the redemption of the 5 and 6 per cent. bonds of the United States authorized to be refunded by the provisions of this act, which shall from time to time be repaid and replaced out of the proceeds of the sale of the bonds or Treasury notes authorized by this act.

Mr. TELLER. I desire to say that as far as I am concerned I am opposed to this amendment of the committee. The proposition of the House was to take $50,000,000 in the Treasury and use it for the purpose of redeeming the 5 and 6 per cent. bonds. The committee change that, and say that while the money may be so taken it shall be only taken as a temporary loan to be replaced. I believe that one hundred and forty-odd millions kept in the Treasury for the purpose of resumption is simply useless. I believe that we could take out $50,000,000 and not feel it; and I believe that $100,000,000 could be taken out, properly taken, and ought to be taken out of the fund that is reserved for resumption. During the last year the total amount of currency redeemed was less, I think, than half a million dollars. There is not any probability that the people will walk up to the Treasury at any time and demand that for their greenbacks they shall have gold or silver; and if they do, it will be only in limited quantities. We have kept in the Treasury now for the last two years nearly one hundred and fifty million dollars in gold under the expectation that somebody would come for it, and during that time the total taken out has been less than $12,000,000. It seems to me to be unwise to continue this system.

It is said by Senators that perhaps we cannot make this refunding a success if we disturb this gold accumulation. We can start by taking $100,000,000 of this money and retire the first $100,000,000 of 5 per cent. bonds, and when you have made a start of that kind the balance will come in. The banks hold over two hundred million dollars of the bonds that are to be redeemed, and when they find that the Government is able to take up $100,000,000 of them, they will be very anxious to come in and get the new bonds in exchange for what they now have of the higher rate of interest bonds, because it will be apparent when you have called in $100,000,000 of them, that this refunding will be a success, whether it is at 3 per cent. or 3½ per cent. I propose, if it is not done by somebody else, after we have passed on all the amendments of the committee, to move to strike out "fifty" and insert "one hundred," so as to make this sum $100,000,000, unless the Senate should indicate that they intend to adhere to the view of the committee, that we are only to take as a temporary loan this $50,000,000, and to replace it out of the first money realized from these bonds.

If I believed that there was any danger to be apprehended by reducing the fund, I should not think of doing it, because I believe that resumption has been of great advantage to the country, and I should regret to see the Government of the United States in a condition where it would not be ready to respond to any just and proper demands that might be made; but after two years of experience I think it safe to say that it is but suspecting something wrong to suppose that the people will in the future do differently from what they have done in the past. I believe $40,000,000 on deposit (and we have now a good deal more than that) will be sufficient at all times, and we could take out a hundred million dollars.

It is said here that we have $72,000,000 of silver, including some bullion and minor money. We have not that amount, but we have some silver on hand. Instead of having $47,000,000 on hand, as has been repeatedly asserted here on the floor, I am told that we have less than $13,000,000. However, whatever it may be, it is certain that we have not $47,000,000 on hand; but that has not very much to do with this particular question. What we do have can be used in addition to the $41,000,000 that will be left in the Treasury to meet any demand that may be made by parties holding our bills.

I have paid a good deal of attention to the suggestions of the Committee on Finance and to the suggestion of the Secretary of the Treasury since I have been in the Senate; but the experience of four years has demonstrated that they have guessed just exactly as the rest of us have guessed upon these financial questions, and they have guessed much wider than the majority of the Senate have guessed. In 1878, three years ago, it was said on the floor of the Senate by the then chairman of the Committee on Finance, that if we adopted what was called the silver bill, resumption would be an impossibility. It was said by the then chairman of the Committee on Finance, and in that he was fully supported by the present Secretary of the Treasury, and he was also fully supported by the present chairman of the Finance Committee, that if we passed the silver bill the greenbacks that were then at a discount of from 1½ to 2 per cent. would immediately fall still lower. The opposite result took place. The greenbacks did not fall, and in a few months after we passed that act it was apparent to everybody that the very passage of the act had aided in resumption.

If there had been any doubt whether resumption was possible or not to the people who looked at it carefully and intelligently, it was certain after the passage of that act that resumption was possible.

It was also said at the time, and it was said by the same Senators who to-day are predicting disasters with reference to this refunding, that if we passed that bill the gold would go out of the country, and silver from all parts of the world where it was not wanted and the people were anxious to get rid of it would come to this country. What has been the result? The gold has poured into this country as it never poured in before, and the silver has not come. The silver that came to this country last year is less than $2,500,000, while we have coined in the mints more than $60,000,000 of foreign gold this year. As was stated yesterday, since that act was passed $250,000,000 of foreign gold have come to this country and entered into the circulation of the precious metals here.

I have lost a little faith in the Finance Committee and a little in the prophecies of the Secretary of the Treasury. When the committee come here and the Secretary of the Treasury comes here and tell me that it is necessary to keep $140,000,000 or $150,000,000 of gold in the Treasury for fear that somebody will some day rush up to the Treasury with a few greenbacks and make a demand of gold for them, I have ceased to believe that there is any such danger. I do not believe it. I believe we ought to take this money lying in the Treasury and put it where it will pay the debts of the nation.

It has been the effort of the Secretary of the Treasury—and I do not say this now to reflect upon him particularly—to discredit the silver of this country, the great production of the country. We produce from $30,000,000 to $40,000,000 every year on an average of silver. We produce this year about eight million dollars less than last year, and we produce a trifle less of silver this year than we produce of gold. It is said by the Secretary, in his report which I have here, that it is impossible to continue the coinage of silver, that it is impossible to keep the silver in circulation; and he tells us that he has got $47,000,000 of silver that the people, as he says, decline to take. He ignores the fact that the Government is the holder, simply on deposit for the people, of almost twenty million dollars of this $47,000,000; so that, according to his own showing, he has only got about twenty-seven million dollars of silver money on deposit; and I am told that since this report was made that amount has largely decreased. During the last year, as shown by the Secretary's report, we put in circulation either of the coin itself or of certificates of silver more silver than we coined. It is not accumulating in the Treasury at all. The honorable Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] said yesterday that we had a skeleton in the closet, and that skeleton is the large amount of silver that we have piled up. There has been an effort made, from the Secretary down through every man in this country who is opposed to the use of the two metals, to make the people understand that there is a condition of affairs here that has never existed before.

Sir, the people of the United States are in favor of both metals, and they believe in giving both metals an opportunity, a chance. I am not going into a speech upon the silver question to-night, because there is not time and it is not entirely germane to this bill. I only allude to these things to say that all this claim that two or three men only are to judge of the financial conditions of the future is not a well founded claim, and that neither the Secretary of the Treasury, with all deference, nor the Finance Committee, have shown themselves so infallible upon this question that their word should be taken without some little examination.

I am opposed to this amendment. I want this section so amended that the Secretary of the Treasury shall be directed, compelled to take $100,000,000 of this money now in the Treasury and reduce the national debt; and then if, in the course of events, anything should happen in the distant future unforeseen, if there should be bad crops, if the balance of trade should be against us, there is a power given him under the resumption act to dispose of bonds and put back the money that may be necessary to meet the demands made upon the Government.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be reported.

The SECRETARY. After the word "use," in line 2 of section 4, it is proposed to insert "temporarily," and after the word "act," in line 6, to insert "which shall from time to time be repaid and replaced out of the proceeds of the sale of the bonds or Treasury notes authorized by this act."

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to say to the Senator from Colorado that the Committee on Finance, in their numerous guessings with reference to this bill, thought for the sake of safety it was a wise thing to insert the words here found in italics. We understood, and it was the common understanding of the promoters of this bill, that the language of the bill as it came from the House precisely covered the idea which we have put into it, and when we called the attention of the Secretary of the Treasury to this fourth section he said it was a wise provision and he did not care to have it changed in the least particular, because the promoters of the bill understood that the language plainly imported that when this money was taken from the Treasury out of the resumption fund it was only taken for a temporary purpose and could be replaced at any time.

That was the construction the Secretary of the Treasury put upon this section in his interviews with the committee; but upon a careful examination of the section the committee concluded that perhaps after all there might be some doubt about this phraseology, and thought that if that was what was intended we had better say so in unequivocal language, and therefore the committee inserted this amendment.

Now, let me say to my friend further, that it is not a matter of the slightest moment perhaps practically, because under the resumption act of 1875 the Secretary of the Treasury can sell just as many bonds as he chooses to sell. There is not the slightest limitation upon his power, except that he is confined to 4, 4½, and 5 per cent. bonds. So then if this provision be not inserted here at all, under that general power if the Secretary of the Treasury took fifty millions of this resumption fund to redeem 5 and 6 per cent. bonds, he could turn around the next day, if he chose to do it, and sell 4 per cent. bonds for the purpose of replacing that money.

Mr. EATON. I hope some gentleman will, before this bill is through, add to it a clause that the Secretary of the Treasury shall not sell any of the 4 per cent. bonds.

Mr. TELLER. I want to ask the Senator from Iowa a question. Does he suppose that any Secretary of the Treasury would, unless there was a pressing demand, sell 4 and 4½ per cent. bonds to replace the money taken out under this section?

Mr. ALLISON. Oh, Mr. President, I do not suppose the Secretary of the Treasury would use this resumption fund in any wasteful or extravagant way; he certainly would not replenish the fund unless it was absolutely necessary to do so, and if he did he could use the fund at any time. I want to call attention to the phraseology here, and to say to my friend from Colorado that he makes a point that was not intended by the House, and as for myself I am not particular whether this amendment is voted in or voted out; but I think it is wise to put it in, in order that the phraseology may be clear and unequivocal:

That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized, if in his opinion it shall become necessary, to use not exceeding $50,000,000.

The committee said, inasmuch as the Secretary believed that this was a power giving him discretion for that purpose, that fund should be replaced if taken in that way under this provision. That is all.

Mr. TELLER. The section as it came from the House will not justify the conclusion that this money was to be replaced; and that the committee knew very well, and therefore they put in "temporarily," and they were not satisfied with putting in "temporarily." If it had come from the House with the word "temporarily" in, it might have been said with some show of reason that it was to be replaced. Nothing of the kind was there. So the committee put in the word "temporarily," and then, to make sure, they add that it shall be replaced afterward. The proposition as it came from the House is that $50,000,000 shall be taken, leaving about one hundred million dollars still in the Treasury available for resumption purposes. I do not believe it is necessary to leave the $100,000,000. I believe $40,000,000 is enough to leave, and I have no doubt that $10,000,000 is enough. Unless there is some great financial disaster there will be no demand practically. The people do not want gold, and they do not want silver. The Secretary of the Treasury says that they do not want silver; he ignores the fact that they do not want gold; but he shows in his report that 55 per cent. of the money paid in for duties has been paid in gold, and only 31 per cent. in silver certificates, and still less in greenbacks—showing that the people want greenbacks more than they want either gold or silver or silver certificates. To meet the greenbacks I do not believe it is necessary that there should be $10,000,000 of gold in the Treasury. I do not believe there will be any demand more than there has been of $75,000 a month from people who want a little gold for some particular purpose, people who are going to Europe or somewhere else, or a few people who want to hoard it.

Mr. BECK. I believe that section 4 as it came from the House is right, and that the amendment of the Committee on Finance does not strengthen it at all. The Senator from Iowa seemed to think that it did, and after a good deal of discussion in committee it was inserted, I think, to please him. But the meaning of the section as it came from the House, as I understand it, is that there being a surplus of gold and silver in the Treasury, bearing no interest, that nobody wants, and as $650,000,000 of five and six percents are to fall due by the 1st day of July, and the holders of the five percents under the act of 1870 have a right to ninety days' notice before they can be called in, and thereby we are paying double interest during that time, and cannot get clear of it because the law gives them the right to it, all this surplus money now lying in the Treasury bearing no interest, doing no good, the Secretary shall have the right to take it out at once and call in $50,000,000 of the bonds soon to be redeemable. Let him make his call for the bonds and use this money to pay them, even though he does not sell the new bonds, the threes or three-and-a-halfs we are to issue now. By using $50,000,000 of coin in that way he will be able to bring in that amount of bonds now outstanding.

Mr. PLUMB. I should like to ask the Senator why the same argument does not apply in favor of taking $100,000,000 of that same money.

Mr. BECK. It might or might not.

Mr. EATON. Why not take it all?

Mr. BECK. Fifty million dollars was sufficient, the Secretary thought.

Mr. BAYARD. The intention was that there was not to be a permanent diminution of that fund. It was not intended that that fund for which $80,000,000 of bonds were sold to get gold into the Treasury, should be permanently diminished.

Mr. BECK. The confession is, I think, that the sale of $95,000,000 of bonds to get gold for the Treasury has proved to be a blunder. If greenbacks had been taken for duties five years before, there would have been no necessity for the resumption act, and we should have resumed five years sooner than we did. The great blunder to-day is that we are now allowing the Secretary to take greenbacks for customs duties in violation of law and refusing to pass a law requiring him to take them, and winking at his doing it, and he is violating the law every time he does it. The trouble has been the attempt to keep the greenback down, to make it bad, and the Secretary will not consent to-day, nor does the Finance Committee consent to-day, that the greenback shall be received at the custom-house, although it is in fact received in violation of the law by an order of the Secretary. I want the law to be obeyed.

The Secretary sold $95,000,000 of bonds in order to get gold and hoard it there, and he is holding it now, and when he did resume, when everybody supposed there would be a rush for gold, there was no rush for gold; nobody wanted it. The struggle now is to see if we cannot do something to get the greenbacks out instead of the gold, because men do not want to pay the cost of the transportation of gold to the interior of the country, and the greenback to-day is at some points at a premium of one-eighth to one-fourth of 1 per cent. over gold because of the cost of transportation. When the Secretary came before the committee I put a question to him as to this section as it came from the House. Here it is on page 20 of the published interview:

Senator BECK. Is section 4, as it now reads, satisfactory, and does it give you the authority you desire?
Secretary SHERMAN. Yes, sir; I think that is all right.

Mr. McDONALD. Does that refer to the original section?

Mr. BECK. The original section as it came from the House; but the Senator from Iowa seemed to fear that there was some trouble about it afterward, and he proposed a modification of it against my judgment. The Secretary said, "Yes; I think that is right." And then:

Senator BECK. That would enable you to take the money out of the Treasury in surplus, so as to make this an appropriation by law.
Secretary SHERMAN. We can reimburse it by the sale of the bonds. It will tend to save interest.

The meaning of it all is, that if any run ever came on the Treasury, under the power he now had he could meet it; but in the mean time let him use this money that nobody wants, that is paying no interest now, and fund with it $50,000,000 of bonds, begin to pay off the fives and the sixes now outstanding, without having to wait until he makes sales of the new bonds. If a contingency shall arise (which I do not think the Secretary or anybody else contemplates for a few years or perhaps ever) then the power to sell bonds exists, and he can reimburse the funds; but if he does not need the coin of course he will not sell bonds. This money he confesses now is lying idle, and by using $50,000,000 of it we may save interest on that amount of bonds, begin the refunding of the fives and sixes at once by means of that fund, and the chances are a hundred to one that he never will need to sell more bonds for that fund. That is what the Secretary said to me.

Mr. EATON. I have not the book by me; but did the Secretary say he would reimburse this fund by the sale of bonds? Did he mean by that a sale of the bonds to be issued now, or of the old bonds?

Mr. BECK. By the sale of any bonds that he was authorized under the resumption act to sell, I presume.

Mr. EATON. Do you suppose he can sell the 4 per cent. bonds?

Mr. BECK. I suppose not. He would not sell any but the bonds now authorized; but he has authority now to sell them. I have no idea that he would sell any but those now authorized. But go a little further. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERRY] then asked the question which and the answer I will read:

Senator FERRY. In that section it is provided that you shall use not exceeding $50,000,000 of gold and silver coin in the Treasury, and then in another part of the section that you may at any time apply the surplus money in the Treasury.
Secretary SHERMAN. That is over and above.
Senator FERRY. It confines you to $50,000,000.
Secretary SHERMAN. I think myself it ought to be confined, because you would not like to leave the Secretary power to strip the Treasury bare of money.
Senator FERRY. But this leaves a discretion at any time to apply the surplus money.
Secretary SHERMAN. The truth is he has the power now, and has exercised it for twenty years.
Senator FERRY. Then what is the point of fixing $50,000,000?
Secretary SHERMAN. That is the limit, and I think a very wise limit.
Senator VOORHEES. I do not know that it would affect the operation of the bill, yet it is an awkward mode of expressing it, it seems to me, because in the forepart of the section there is a limit, and immediately afterward it is followed by no limit.
Senator KERNAN. That is the surplus money. He is to use money that is held there for another purpose to the amount of $50,000,000.
Secretary SHERMAN. He can use $50,000,000 of the resumption fund.
Senator FERRY. The bill does not say that.
Senator BECK. I understand that the Constitution provides that you can take no money out of the Treasury except by virtue of an appropriation made by law.
Secretary SHERMAN. That is true.
Senator BECK. Therefore, this surplus that you have over and above what is necessary for the sinking fund you cannot use unless there is an appropriation authorizing you to do it.
Secretary SHERMAN. No, we cannot use it. This fund is specially set aside by law for the redemption of United States notes, and the Secretary of the Treasury has no more power to diminish that fund than any other fund.
Senator BECK. Then there is a proviso at the close of section 4:
"That the bonds and certificates so purchased or redeemed shall constitute no part of the sinking fund, but shall be canceled."
That means that you shall not swell up your sinking fund by the use of this money beyond what is otherwise provided.
Secretary SHERMAN. That is right.

The meaning of this whole proviso is this: When money is in the Treasury—as there is a large amount of gold now held for resumption—to cover and protect resumption we cannot use it to buy bonds unless we authorize the Secretary by this law to do it, because the Constitution says he shall not take any money out of the Treasury except in accordance with appropriations made by law. No matter how much he has, no matter how useless it may be, how idle it may be, he cannot use it until we authorize him, as we propose to do by the fourth section of this bill, to take it out. It has to lie there and remain idle, because when put in for one purpose it cannot be used for another except in accordance with an appropriation made by law; and this fourth section does make that appropriation and authorize him to take it out and use it for the purchase of bonds, and thereby save interest. At the same time the power exists in him, if ever the emergency arises, to supply by the sale of bonds whatever is necessary to redeem the greenbacks.

Mr. EATON. I suppose the Senator from Kentucky does not desire the Senate to misunderstand the testimony of the Secretary.

Mr. BECK. Of course not; I have read it.

Mr. EATON. I know; but I call the Senator's attention to the meaning of the sale of bonds, and the Senator did not give it as the Secretary did:

Senator BECK. That would enable you to take the money out of the Treasury in surplus, so as to make this an appropriation by law.
Secretary SHERMAN. We can reimburse it by the sale of the bonds.

That is, the bonds which we are now about to authorize, those authorized by this act, not the bonds which he has in hand now, simply to save interest.

Mr. BECK. I read precisely what the Secretary said.

Mr. EATON. I know you did.

Mr. BECK. "We can reimburse it by the sale of the bonds. It will tend to save interest." What he meant by that each Senator can construe for himself as well as I can. I said that I believed he would sell bonds if an emergency arose, which never will arise and which nobody anticipates. We all know it is too remote a possibility to be well considered; but if he is to sell any bonds at all, he will sell these bonds. Under existing law he has a right to sell any of the bonds authorized by the resumption act, and that law has never been repealed, and the authority exists in him, while I do not believe he will exercise it.

Mr. MORRILL. Will the Senator from Kentucky allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BECK. Certainly.

Mr. MORRILL. Will the Secretary of the Treasury after having once used this $50,000,000 of coin as the bill came to us from the House, and after having given the notice for calling in bonds, have power to repeat that process under section 4 so as to facilitate the payment of the loans without loss of interest from time to time; or will he be confined simply to the use of the $50,000,000 once and once only?

Mr. BECK. The section reads:

That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized, if in his opinion it shall become necessary, to use not exceeding $50,000,000 of the standard gold and silver coin in the Treasury in the redemption of the 5 and 6 per cent. bonds of the United States authorized to be refunded by the provisions of this act.

I understand that to mean that he has a right to take out of the surplus gold and silver coin now lying there and not needed, that much of it, to refund the fives and sixes we are now seeking to refund.

Mr. ALLISON. As I understand, the 5 per cent. bonds cannot be redeemed except upon ninety days' notice.

Mr. BECK. I have said so.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well. Now, if I understand that section, it is to give the Secretary of the Treasury a sort of floating fund, by which he can make a call for $50,000,000 of bonds, and pay them out of this fund in the Treasury, thus saving interest; and he then reimburses the fund from the proceeds of the bonds sold during the ninety days; and then he makes another call, and pays again out of the fund in the Treasury, and so on until the loan is completed. I see that that will be a very great saving of interest; but if only one sale can be made, of course the power is exhausted the moment it is once exercised. The section gives him $50,000,000 capital, as I read it, whereas if he can only use the fund once it is no capital.

Mr. BECK. The effort of the House was to enable him to take up $50,000,000 of bonds by using so much of this fund, which is now of no use, and use it to save interest.

Mr. BAYARD. The discretion is controlled by the use of the word "reimbursed." The standard gold and silver coin is to be reimbursed, that is returned and repaid out of the proceeds of the sales of the bonds authorized by this act, and the very last word the Secretary says upon page 21 is this:

The fact is that the gold and silver are kept there for the purpose of redeeming the legal-tender notes upon presentation, as required by law.

And then he goes on to give a statement showing the surplus revenues of the Government at different times. The bonds of this Government were sold under the resumption act of 1875 to get that gold and that silver there. It never was intended that that fund should be destroyed and these $50,000,000 taken out not to be replaced. The object of the amendment of the committee was to make that fact clearer. It was the wish of the honorable Senator from Iowa, and I moved the amendment myself in order to prevent any misunderstanding on the subject. It never was the intention of the Secretary of the Treasury—and his testimony here proves it—to do otherwise than temporarily use this money; and it was to make that intent clearer that we used the language of the amendment. As the Senator from Iowa has well said, if the money can be used but once its power to assist in floating this loan would be ended by its single use. When you return it, you may use it over and over again, but you can only do that by reimbursing it, and it surely was not the intention of Congress to break up a resumption fund for which bonds were sold and to supply which more bonds must be sold.

Mr. KERNAN. I did not intend in committee, and do not now, to consent to any idea that the Secretary shall be authorized to use the fund of coin in the Treasury now for the redemption of our United States notes. They are good now, and why? Because we are prepared to cash them on demand in coin. They are convertible into coin. I am opposed to setting a precedent which will touch or exhaust that fund, which is there for that purpose, by allowing it to be used in any other way permanently. It was because I understood the bill as it came from the House to intend only that the Secretary should use it temporarily as a fund anticipating the sale of the bonds, and to save interest for the reason stated, that I consented to these amendments, which were reported to make it clear that we should keep faith with the holders of United States notes, keep them fully up to par as they only can be kept fully up to par by our being prepared to redeem them in coin. When that is apparent they will be at par, and there will be no calling for gold. If we begin now by taking $50,000,000 from this fund permanently, then, as my friend well said, why not take fifty millions more or one hundred millions more, and then your paper will depreciate and we shall again have the evils of a fluctuating standard of value.

Mr. McDONALD. I should like to ask the Senator from New York a question. Is there any coin in the Treasury at this time except that which is held there as a redemption fund?

Mr. KERNAN. I will answer that. First we were talking about taking from the redemption fund of the Treasury——

Mr. McDONALD. How much is there?

Mr. KERNAN. I will come to that in a moment and show what we did about that. The fact is that a certain amount of gold and silver is kept there for the purpose of redeeming the legal-tender notes on presentation as required by law, and we were talking about using $50,000,000 of that fund temporarily. Now, I will turn to the bill. There are two clauses; one is:

> And he may at any time apply the surplus money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, or so much thereof as he may consider proper, to the purchase or redemption of United States bonds or Treasury notes.

The Secretary was speaking of the $50,000,000 to come from the fund held to redeem United States notes, the resumption fund; and we say he may use temporarily that much of it, replacing it after he has saved the interest and sold the bonds; and then we also say that he may use the surplus money to redeem the notes. I do certainly understand that there is a clear distinction between the fund and the surplus money here referred to. The surplus money is what is not by law appropriated for any other purpose, in the Treasury. This fund is pledged to redeem United States notes. It makes them good, gives us a sound currency, is a pledge to be kept there to redeem the notes; and we say to the Secretary, "You may use so much of that temporarily to save interest." Then we say further, "You may use all the surplus money that is there," meaning something not pledged or not appropriated for the redemption of the legal-tender notes.

I trust we shall leave the Secretary this discretion, making it plain so that no Secretary can understand that we authorize him to use money appropriated or pledged to be kept in the Treasury to redeem our notes to pay them on demand, for any other purpose except as we provide for this temporary use to save interest and pledge the bonds to be held to repay it.

Mr. McDONALD. When looking at this section and the amendment proposed to it, it seems to me that to relieve it of all ambiguity there should be an amendment to the first part of the section to this effect, that this $50,000,000 authorized to be taken from the gold and silver in the Treasury for the redemption of bonds should be of the fund now held in the Treasury for the redemption of the circulating notes of the United States. If it applies to a different fund than that referred to in the latter part of the section, by which the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to apply any surplus in the Treasury to the redemption of these new notes, then that distinction ought to be made clear that it does apply to a different fund, a fund held there for some other purpose, the purpose of which, however, may not be of such an exigency that it requires immediate use, so that it may be temporarily employed in the manner herein provided.

Mr. BAYARD. Let us adopt the amendment of the committee, and then we can prepare another amendment if it is necessary.

Mr. KERNAN. I am sure that both the Secretary and the committee understand it as I have stated.

Mr. McDONALD. If it is to withdraw temporarily any part of the coin held under the law for the redemption of the circulating notes of the United States, then I think it ought to be replaced; but if it is a surplus to be used, I see no necessity for its replacement. If it is intended to be of the first class, the bill ought to so specify.

Mr. KERNAN. Adopt this amendment, and we can be prepared to meet that point.

Mr. McPHERSON. Will the chairman of the Committee on Finance answer me one question? On the 1st day of January, 1879, the day fixed by law for the resumption of specie payments, there was a certain sum of money in the Treasury of the United States for the purposes of resumption. Experience proves that that sum was sufficient for the purposes of resumption, because all of the Treasury notes that were presented for redemption were redeemed. Now, will the honorable Senator tell me how much that has been increased?

Mr. KERNAN. The notes were redeemed and issued again, for by law we compelled the Treasury to keep reissuing them.

Mr. McPHERSON. But the fact I wish to get at is, how much that fund has been increased since January 1, 1879. I only wish to know how much increase of gold and silver there has been in the Treasury since the 1st of January, 1879.

Mr. BAYARD. I know about the amount there now.

Mr. McPHERSON. The statements of the Secretary of the Treasury should show it.

Mr. BAYARD. I have the Secretary's report, which shows the amount of gold and standard silver coin, and it is something near two hundred million dollars. I had the figures here and stated them in some remarks I made to the Senate in opening the discussion. I think the amount of gold is about one hundred and forty million dollars and of the standard silver about forty million dollars; that is, independent of certificates.

Mr. McPHERSON. Is the excess over what was there in 1879 equal to the $50,000,000 proposed to be taken from the Treasury?

Mr. BAYARD. I cannot answer as to the precise amount of gold and silver in the Treasury on the day fixed for resumption.

Mr. INGALLS. I can answer the Senator from New Jersey. The amount of gold coin and bullion in the Treasury January 1, 1879, the date of the resumption of specie payments, was $135,382,639.42, which had been increased up to the date of November 1, 1880, to the amount of $140,952,837.74.

Mr. BAYARD. That is gold. Then of silver there was about forty-eight million dollars besides.

Mr. INGALLS. Forty-seven million eighty-four thousand four hundred and fifty-nine dollars.

Mr. McPHERSON. Then there has been an increase of over fifty million dollars in gold and silver together since the 1st of January, 1879.

Mr. BAYARD. But the Senator will understand that the silver standard dollars have been coined since the date of resumption. There were none in the Treasury at that time.

Mr. TELLER. Does not the Senator know that that does not enter into the resumption fund at all? The silver dollar does not enter into that. There are one hundred and forty million dollars and odd, besides the $47,000,000 of silver.

Mr. BAYARD. I cannot state whether there is a separate fund kept. That is the reason why I objected somewhat to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana, that we should say that this should be taken from the resumption fund. I know not whether there is a fund upon the Treasury books bearing that name.

Mr. ALLISON. There is no such fund designated on the books of the Treasury, but the sum set apart to it is about one hundred and forty million dollars.

Mr. BECK. Fifty million dollars more now than at the time of resumption.

Mr. ALLISON. But that $50,000,000 represents silver certificates and certificates of indebtedness held by people outside as a special fund. Look at the Treasury statement and you will see it.

Mr. McPHERSON. The reason for my asking the question was that I wished to be able to form a judgment whether I could with propriety vote for this section of the House bill without the amendment offered by the Committee on Finance. If there is any danger to resumption at all, I certainly am in favor of voting for a temporary removal of the fund, to be replaced again by the sales of the bonds or Treasury notes. If there is $50,000,000 standing to the credit of the Treasury to-day more than there was on the 1st of January, 1879, which experience has proved was all-sufficient, all that was necessary for the purposes of the resumption fund, then I shall vote for the House section pure and simple, and against the amendment of our committee.

Mr. INGALLS. The $141,000,000 that is held in the Treasury as a resumption fund, as I understand, rests entirely upon the will of the Secretary of the Treasury. The amount was not fixed in the law authorizing the resumption of specie payments, but he was directed to establish a fund sufficient to maintain resumption, and he has fixed upon the sum of $140,000,000 or $141,000,000.

Mr. McPHERSON. Now, will the Senator state how much has been redeemed by resumption?

Mr. INGALLS. I was going on to state that it is a very singular fact that during the twenty-two months elapsing from the time when specie payments were resumed up to the 1st day of November, 1880, the entire amount of legal-tender currency presented for redemption in coin was less than $12,000,000, and of that sum during the last ten months of that period the amount was a little over five hundred thousand dollars. So that if the coin that was placed in the Treasury and set apart as a fund for the resumption of specie payments and redemption of the legal-tender notes had been placed at interest, the amount that it would have earned would have sufficed to have redeemed nearly every dollar that was presented, and it might have been put in the fire and burned up and the country would have been just as rich as it is to-day and would have an addition to its wealth of the amount of interest that would have been earned.

Now, Mr. President, I contend that experience has shown that the judgment of the Secretary of the Treasury is at fault. The law did not fix the amount of the fund to be placed in the Treasury for resumption purposes. The Secretary of the Treasury was directed to prepare and set apart a fund for that purpose, which he did, and experience has shown that that is vastly in excess of the amount necessary for that purpose.

Mr. BAYARD. But is not that made practicable only by the accompanying power to sell to an unlimited amount bonds of the United States bearing 4, 4½, or 5 per cent. interest to any extent necessary for the purpose of buying gold and silver to redeem the notes in case they are presented?

Mr. INGALLS. If that power exists in the Secretary of the Treasury, what is the use of keeping $140,000,000 of dead capital in the Treasury earning nothing?

Mr. BAYARD. Because it saves the issuance of the Government credit to sell the Government bonds.

Mr. INGALLS. The bonds would be redeemed if this coin were used for that purpose; and if the emergency should arise hereafter when there would be occasion for any increase in the amount of the public debt, the Secretary of the Treasury under the resumption act of January, 1875, is authorized to sell bonds for the purpose of making this fund, and he did sell bonds to the amount of $95,500,000 of fours and four-and-a-halfs.

Mr. BAYARD. And the gold and silver there now is the proceeds of that sale.

Mr. INGALLS. Ninty-five million five hundred thousand dollars is the proceeds of that sale, and the rest has been accumulated out of the surplus revenues.

Mr. BAYARD. Out of customs duties.

Mr. INGALLS. He has decided as a matter of judgment on his part that the amount of gold coin to be held in the Treasury necessary for redemption purposes is $140,000,000, and that in face of the fact that within the period of twenty-two months since redemption existed, up to the time when his last report was made, the entire amount presented had been less than $12,000,000.

Mr. McMILLAN. Will the Senator from Kansas allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. INGALLS. Yes, sir.

Mr. McMILLAN. If the Secretary of the Treasury had not reserved that amount of coin, what assurance has the Senator from Kansas that a very much greater amount of the currency would not have been presented for redemption?

Mr. INGALLS. Well, Mr. President, I have no assurance at all.

Mr. McMILLAN. Very well.

Mr. INGALLS. That is the most remarkable interrogatory that I have ever heard submitted by one human being to another. What assurance have we that if the Secretary of the Treasury had not set apart $140,000,000 in coin in the Treasury as a fund for redemption a vastly greater amount would not have been presented to be redeemed! Does the Senator from Minnesota present that as an argument, or is he inclined to be jocular? The fact is——

Mr. McMILLAN. If the Senator will return an answer to the question, perhaps it will appear whether the question is sensible or not. I have no doubt wisdom will die with the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. INGALLS. It never was born with the Senator from Minnesota. That is very evident.

Now, Mr. President, instead of saying, as the House bill does, that the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to use $50,000,000 out of the resumption fund or the reserve gold in the Treasury, I would say that he should be required to use $100,000,000. Resumption has been established; and in case there should be any emergency arising hereafter by which it appeared evident that there was to be a demand upon the Treasury for the redemption of legal-tender notes, the power would still exist in the Secretary of the Treasury at any moment to increase the fund by the sale of any of the bonds authorized by law.

Mr. McPHERSON. The Senator appears to have the tables of the amount of money in the Treasury. Will he please tell me now what portion of the $140,000,000 was made up by a sale of bonds?

Mr. INGALLS. Ninety-five million five hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. McPHERSON. Does the Senator pretend to say that the Secretary of the Treasury in anticipation of the needs for resumption purposes sold $95,000,000 of bonds and placed the proceeds in the Treasury?

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. INGALLS. He sold $65,000,000 of four-and-a-halfs and thirty and a half millions of fours.

Mr. McPHERSON. And only $12,000,000 have been sent in for redemption?

Mr. INGALLS. During the period of twenty-two months from the 1st of January, 1879, to the 1st of November, 1880; and of that sum during the ten months of the last year, prior to November 1, the amount presented for redemption was a little in excess of $500,000, and during the month of October, 1880, the entire amount presented was $9,000. So the demand has been constantly diminishing from the time when specie payments were resumed on the 1st of January, 1879, down to October 31, 1880, when we have the last report, so that in that month the entire amount presented for redemption was $9,000, and for these purposes the Secretary of the Treasury holds in the Treasury the sum of $141,000,000 in gold coin, for which we are paying at the rate of 4 and 4½ per cent. on $95,500,000, and the balance of which might be put into similar securities and earn a like amount. As I said before, the interest that would be earned by this money if it were put at work would have redeemed almost the entire amount presented, and it might have been burned up and consumed and entirely wiped out from the national debt.

Mr. FERRY. I should like to ask a question of the Senator from Kansas. Is not the fact made known to the public that there is $140,000,000 of coin in the Treasury an assurance to the people that the currency, the greenbacks as they are termed, will be promptly redeemed or paid on presentation?

Mr. INGALLS. The public do not know that this money is in the Treasury.

Mr. FERRY. Certainly the fact is published.

Mr. INGALLS. It is published, but who reads it? Who has known it in this Senate until within the last twenty-four hours? Who could have told how much money there was in the Treasury held for resumption purposes?

Mr. FERRY. They might not have known the exact amount, but they get the monthly statements.

Mr. INGALLS. I ask, as a reply to the question of the Senator from Michigan, who in this Senate knew what the amount of gold coin was held in the Treasury for resumption purposes before this debate began?

Mr. FERRY. We knew it by the monthly statements.

Mr. INGALLS. I venture to say that the Senator cannot state now how much there is in the Treasury. When he speaks about this knowledge being an assurance to the people, I respond that the people do not know anything about it. The assurance the people have rests upon the fact, in the first place, that the currency has been promptly redeemed, and it rests beyond and far outside of all that on the fact that nobody wants any gold or silver; nobody asks for it. The people prefer the paper.

Mr. FERRY. I notice that the amount of coin in the Treasury which the Senator has stated, and we all know it now, is about 40 per cent. of the volume of greenbacks. That amount is based upon the judgment of all bankers——

Mr. INGALLS. Based on the judgment of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. FERRY. Bankers consider that 40 per cent. of coin it is necessary to keep for the redemption of their bills; so that I take it the Secretary of the Treasury in fixing that amount has based it upon the common judgment of bankers.

Mr. McDONALD. Mr. President, with the explanation that has been made in reference to these two parts of section 4, I think perhaps it is proper that the amendment reported by the Committee on Finance should be adopted; but when it is adopted I shall propose an amendment in addition to line 4 to this effect, after the word "Treasury" to insert "now held for the redemption of United States Treasury notes;" so as to make the section read "to use temporarily not exceeding $50,000,000 of the standard gold and silver coin in the Treasury now held for the redemption of United States notes," &c. Then it will provide for the replacement of so much of that fund as the Secretary of the Treasury may think it necessary to use.

Mr. COCKRELL. Would that not have the effect of authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to pay out gold coin alone, as that was the only coin that he absolutely purchased for redemption and holds as a redemption fund, and nullify the words "gold and silver coin?'

Mr. McDONALD. No; I apprehend not. I apprehend that the coin which he holds in the Treasury (which I understand is one hundred and forty millions) as a redemption fund embraces silver coin as well as gold coin.

Mr. COCKRELL. No.

Mr. TELLER. It embraces nothing but gold coin.

Mr. ALLISON. May I call the attention of the Senator from Indiana to one fact, and that is, that no money is held in the Treasury and set apart specifically for the redemption of United States notes by the name of a redemption fund? Therefore, if his amendment is added, I do not believe it will strengthen the bill at all.

Mr. McDONALD. I desire that there shall be a clear distinction drawn between the coin which the Secretary of the Treasury may use temporarily in purchasing United States bonds that may become due, and that application which in the latter clause of this section he is authorized to make at any time of the surplus in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for certainly all money that he may thus apply as money not otherwise appropriated would not be expected to be restored again to the Treasury, for it would be absolutely an appropriation. This section appropriates that surplus for that purpose. It seems to me, therefore, that the money which may be temporarily used to be refunded ought to be distinguished, and clearly distinguished, from that surplus which this bill proposes to appropriate.

One word as to the amount of coin in the Treasury held for the redemption of United States Treasury notes, the one hundred and forty millions said to be there, and which my friend from Kansas thinks is entirely useless there. There may be no necessity for the amount now held, but I apprehend that if on the 1st of January, 1879, there had been but ten millions in the Treasury of gold coin, and if there had been no silver provided for by the act of 1878 that could be applied to the redemption of these circulating notes, the $346,000,000 of circulating notes then out and that are still outstanding would have long since been presented to the Treasury. If there had been but the sum which has been paid out in redemption the last twenty-two months in the Treasury, if there had not been back of that the means of repelling, if you please, the assaults that the men who held that currency would have made upon the Treasury, it would have been broken down long ago. Although Senators may not have known how much coin there was in the Treasury, and although the country at large may not have had specific information on that subject, I say to you, Mr. President, that the moneyed men of this country, the men who make money by the use of money, by, if possible, making a difference of a quarter of 1 per cent. between one class of circulation and another, would have very soon ascertained how much coined money there was in the Treasury, and how the credit of the Government was to be broken down by drawing it out.

Mr. EATON. They did know all the while how much was there, and therefore they made no effort to break it down.

Mr. McDONALD. Knowing that they could not make a run on the Treasury successfully they did not try it. That is all there is about it, and I do not think we have passed so far through this experiment of resumption that it would be very safe for us to reduce in any great degree the amount of that fund so held. Although we may have but little interest on it for the time being, it is a safety to the credit of the Government that it cannot very well dispense with at this time.

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. President, the law for the establishment of national banks fixed the maximum fund for redemption which the banks are required to keep for the payment of their deposits at 25 per cent. in what are known as redemption cities; in all other places it is fixed at 15 per cent. That law is said to crystallize the business judgment of men upon that particular question. In cities like New York, Cincinnati, and New Orleans, the amount required to be kept is 25 per cent. of the sum on deposit; in the country banks it is 15 per cent. That is to provide for the payment of an actual deposit; it is to provide for the payment of that which men need for the transaction of their business. That is deemed to be sufficient for all practical purposes and to protect the banks against the danger of a run, or of anything except a most extraordinary condition of things.

The law provides also for the deposit of 5 per cent. of the national-bank circulation in the Treasury of the United States as a redemption fund for the redemption of the national-bank circulation; in other words, for the $320,000,000 of national-bank circulation now outstanding $16,000,000 is required to be kept in the Treasury, and that $16,000,000 has performed fully and perfectly not only the office of redemption proper during the entire time it has been there, but also the office of the restoration of worn-out bank-notes. I venture to say that of all the national-bank notes which have been presented to the Treasury of the United States for redemption under the act requiring the banks to keep 5 per cent. of their circulation there for that purpose, not 1 per cent. has ever been presented because the bill was worn out. In other words, no man has ever practically presented a dollar of national-bank circulation to the Treasury of the United States for redemption because he wanted some other kind of money. And yet the national-bank note is not as good as the greenback.

Five per cent. has proved ample when the public knew there was only 5 per cent. in the Treasury to protect and keep at par the national-bank circulation of the United States. If my check were just as good as a greenback, if it were negotiable by delivery and were just as certain to be good a thousand miles away from where it is payable as it is at the place where it is payable and at all times, then I might or any other individual might draw 75 per cent. more against his account than the amount of money he had on his check-book. But the condition of things in relation to the Government transaction is entirely different. When a man takes a greenback he has that which performs all the offices which money can perform. It pays customs dues, pays his obligations to the Government, pays his obligations to his fellow-men; it is equally good everywhere. There is no inducement under the shining sun to him to present that for exchange into any other thing unless indeed it may be that a man has in his mind the producing of something else. The only inducement to anybody to come to the Treasury of the United States with any considerable sum of greenbacks and ask that he shall have gold and silver for them is that he may produce some ulterior purpose which is opposed to solvency and which is opposed to the ordinary methods of transacting business.

It has been said that there are some men who have the power to get together a large quantity of greenbacks and bankrupt the Treasury if the amount of gold there for the redemption of notes is small. There are two persons whose names have been mentioned, two prominent citizens of the city of New York, who it is said could get together in a few minutes $50,000,000 of greenbacks. Grant it. They can sell on the market perhaps at any time $50,000,000 of securities; but with what effect? In the first place, the selling of those securities in that sum, and during that period of time, or during any other reasonable period of time, would be productive of immense loss to them, not only upon the securities sold, but upon all the other property held and owned by them. Mr. Vanderbilt and Mr. Gould, or Mr. Anybody else cannot lock up $25,000,000 in the city of New York without producing a business depression which would rob him of any possible profit to be realized by that kind of a transaction. And when he came to the Treasury, what then? The Secretary is equally authorized to pay out gold or silver, and I am in favor myself of giving to every person who holds a Government obligation, whether in the shape of a contract or a bond, the kind of money he wants of the different kinds the Government issues, provided he wants it for legitimate purposes; and if one of these gentlemen or anybody else were to come to the Treasury with $25,000,000 of greenback funds and say: "I want gold," it would be at the option of the Secretary, and it would be not only his privilege but his duty to say: "Bring up your cart and take silver;" and that settles that question.

Mr. EATON. Carts?

Mr. PLUMB. My friend from Connecticut says "carts." He is right; I probably ought to use the plural term, and I will use it; it ought to be "carts."

In addition, if anything of that kind is to be done it must be well done in order to be successful. Who wants to try to break the Treasury of the United States unless he accomplishes it, unless the ruin which he seeks to make will be visited on somebody else besides himself? And who believes that with the power in the Secretary of the Treasury, as stated here by the chairman of the Finance Committee, to sell any amount of 4 and 4½ per cent. bonds that he desires, any man will ever undertake such a job with any expectation of success? It is just like the old Frenchman who came with his check to the bank and they paid him out every dollar. "Ah," said he, "you got him, then I don't want him; you no got him, then I do want him." If the money is there to pay—the power of the Secretary is there to pay at all times and in all cases every dollar that is outstanding—no man who has the paper dollar wants the gold; he wants simply the dollar which he has got.

It is a peculiarity of our method of doing business that we take hold of that alone which we can handle the easiest and the cheapest. All the tendency of modern business is to the short cut. We want that which can be carried from one section of the country to the other with the least expense. Therefore we take the greenback in place of gold, and we take the draft in place of either, and there is no condition of things possible, or at all events within the limits of any human probability, that will ever permit the presentation of even $5,000,000 of greenbacks at any one time for redemption to the Secretary of the Treasury; and for the same reason that, as I said before, 5 per cent. of the national bank circulation has been ample for its redemption. Here is a better currency, and an equal amount of money in the Treasury of the United States will suffice for the redemption of the greenback as well as it does for the national-bank note. But there is no use in higgling about a question of a few millions. No one proposes to cut the fund down to 5 per cent.; let it be 25 per cent., if you will; but where is the necessity in the present condition of things of keeping $140,000,000 of coin in the Treasury for that purpose? It ought not to be so, not only because we are losing the interest, but it ought not to be so because to-day the country needs that money for the purpose of transacting its business.

I speak of that which I know when I say that when the crops of the West come to be moved there is a great stringency; there is great need for more money, which is scantily supplied. Money has to be brought from New York and Chicago and Saint Louis, and the demands of business there are such that after it goes to the points where it is needed to move the crops it is immediately sucked up, as it were, and carried back to those money centers, leaving our section of country largely denuded of money. We are building new railroads in that section of country. Everywhere the spirit of enterprise needs more money, money that can be used not as checks, but as gold is used, as silver is used; that which actually is money, and not merely its representative. And as we go on extending our population west and building up these new enterprises we shall constantly need more; but during the time we need it the Treasury hoards it up, and not only deprives the people of the United States of the interest upon that money, but deprives them of what is of a great deal more consequence, the use of it meantime, retards their business, clogs it, to a certain extent breaks it up, makes the carrying of it on a great deal more expensive than it otherwise would be. It is the beginning of a wise policy, of a true regard for the credit of the United States, that a large sum, I say at least $100,000,000, should be taken from the Treasury of the United States and devoted to the redemption of that much of the interest-bearing obligations of the United States now outstanding, and that money put out, in order that it may fill the channels of trade and perform the office it was created for.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. McMILLAN] inquired whether we have any assurance that if this coin had not been in the Treasury from January 1, 1879, there would not have been a greater demand for the redemption of legal-tender notes. Now, I am free to admit that in my judgment there would have been a demand for more money than there was. There is not any doubt about that. The fact that the money was there kept a great many men who otherwise would have gone there with their greenbacks from going. They would not have gone to the Treasury because they wanted the money for its use, but because there had been for many years a speculation in gold. Now we have passed that period; nobody believes we can return to it unless some great disaster shall overtake us like the war that we had some years since. People did go to the Treasury and did take a million and a half of money the first month; the next month they took nearly a million; and the next month nearly a million. Then they began gradually to drop off, and it was apparent then that there was no speculation in it and none could be had; and then there was an opportunity for the Secretary of the Treasury to have reduced the money that he was authorized to hold, but instead of doing that he increased it. As the demand made on the Treasury for gold in exchange for paper money fell off, he increased his supply of gold.

Can anybody give any reason for that? In the ten months of 1880 preceding the 1st day of November, there was only $406,000 all told presented, and in the twenty-two months following resumption there was less than $12,000,000, as I stated before. Now, with the experience of two years, with no indication that there is to be any movement like a speculation in gold, the thing being impossible, we are told that we must keep piled up $140,000,000 of gold always, forever, until we see fit to retire the greenback money. Why, Mr. President, it is a proper thing, I admit, to keep some money in the Treasury for this purpose. I think that every prudent bank should keep some money on hand and every prudent bank in this country, even during the excitement when gold was up, attempted to keep some gold. They did it I know in some of the Western banks even at the high price of gold; they kept more or less, and as gold fell they kept more; and the Government ought to keep some gold and ought always to have some, but is it necessary to have $140,000,000?

Mr. PADDOCK. I should like to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. TELLER. I will answer if I can; I do not know that I can. I am not a financier.

Mr. PADDOCK. I supposed the Senator was, from the arguments I have heard him make here to-day. Suppose that the national banks were required to redeem their notes over their own counters in gold as they might be presented, what percentage of gold does the Senator think the banks ought to have in their vaults to keep themselves protected?

Mr. TELLER. I am not a banker. It has not been my business in life to handle money. I do not pretend to know very much about the practical details of banking, but I know that no bank in the country ever kept 40 per cent., when banks were worth having, and that would be considered, according to my judgment and my limited experience as connected with banks, an extremely stupid thing for banks to do.

Mr. PADDOCK. I think if the Senator will investigate he will ascertain that all human experience in banking has demonstrated that between 30 and 40 per cent. of specie is an absolute necessity.

Mr. TELLER. Never at any time. Under the old banking system there was no law that required them to keep more than 20 per cent., so far as I know. As was said by the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. PLUMB,] we require the national banks to keep the enormous sum of 5 per cent. in the Treasury of the United States to redeem their circulation, and that is ample, and that accomplishes the purpose.

Why do the people not go up to the Treasury to get gold? Because they do not want it; because they will not have it. I hold before me the report of the Secretary, in which he shows that 57 per cent. and a fraction of all the money received at our ports of entry is received in gold. Why? Because the people who had greenbacks would not pay the greenbacks out. Eleven per cent. of the amount received was received in greenbacks, and 31 per cent. was received in silver certificates. It is a fact pretty well understood that men have been found in this country so stupid as to exchange gold for silver certificates. Why? Because these Treasury certificates could pass more readily from hand to hand than the gold. People may talk as much as they please about the inconvenience of silver; when you come to handle gold it is just as inconvenient as silver. Put $500 of gold in your pocket and you cannot walk up and down the streets of this city without inconvenience. Anybody who has tried it knows it; but you can put a million dollars of greenbacks there if you are so fortunate as to have them, and do it. I have never tried that. The reason why they will not step up to the counter and demand gold is because they would not take it if it was offered to them, and the Government has found trouble in paying the gold. The railroad companies in the West have been paying gold, and the people who have been taking it from them have been clamoring for greenbacks, and have preferred the disgraced and debased representation called a silver certificate. They have been willing to take a silver certificate from a railroad company in payment of their debts rather than to take gold.

I repeat again that in my judgment (and I do not believe that anybody can give a good reason why we should do more) $10,000,000 is ample. If you have got $10,000,000 and the people come with $10,000,000 of greenbacks and they cannot aggregate more than that——

Mr. BLAIR. As the Senator is talking to me pretty much, I want to ask him a question.

Mr. TELLER. I will hear the Senator when I finish the sentence. If they go to the Treasury for gold, and it exceeded that amount, and I think it would be pretty difficult to exceed $20,000,000 or $25,000,000 which you will have left over, the Secretary can go upon the market and immediately offer 4 and 4½ per cent. bonds, and they would be snapped up as quickly as possible for the bankers to make their checks payable in gold. Therefore, it is practically impossible to make a raid upon the public Treasury. Now I will hear the Senator, if he has got any question he wants to ask, provided it is one that I can answer.

Mr. BLAIR. It has occurred to me that this discussion as to the amount of gold reserve, which has been going on for a long time, is treated with reference to resumption alone. I should like to ask the Senator if he does not believe the fact that this large amount of gold in the Treasury on deposit is a very significant and efficient factor in connection with refunding purposes themselves? I would ask the Senator if he believes that if there were only $10,000,000 of gold in the possession of the Treasury the rate upon the Government bonds to-day would be any less than 6 per cent.? But for this large deposit we should not be able to-day to be refunding the debt of the United States at anything like 3 or 3½ per cent.

Mr. TELLER. The amount of money in the Treasury in my judgment has nothing to do with the interest on the bonds. It is the ability of the Government to meet its bonds when it agrees to meet them that settles that question. What does the man who has a bond payable in 1907 care whether there are $200,000,000 or $250,000,000 of gold in the Treasury? What has he to do with it? He knows that the duties are ample to pay his interest. That has nothing in the world to do with it, in my judgment.

Mr. BLAIR. I do not suppose it is any use to discuss a matter of this kind with the Senator from Colorado. He says he is no banker, neither am I, nor the son of a banker, but I can comprehend it as a possible thing that if the confidence of the country in the ability of the Government to redeem, and redeem instantly, the legal-tender currency were in any wise shaken in the most infinitesimal degree, we should not be able to-day to be hiring money at less than individuals of good credit. There is no business man in the country who can hire money to-day for less than 5 or 6 per cent.; no matter how much he is worth, no matter how good his credit simply as a business man. I believe that nothing enables the Government of the United States to be refunding its obligations at 4½, at 4, and now at 3½ and possibly at 3 per cent., but the well-known fact that there is gold enough on deposit to break down any possible combination that might affect the public credit. It is not simply sufficient to protect the credit of the Government in the redemption of the greenbacks; we have got more than that to do; and that is done so far as refunding purposes are concerned by this immense deposit of gold.

Mr. TELLER. That is not a question, and I do not know when the Senator will get through.

Mr. BLAIR. If it is not a question, it may be taken as a matter of instruction by the Senator.

Mr. TELLER. It is a regular argument that the Senator has interjected into my speech. He says that he does not know anything about finance. I hardly believe he does, if he makes the statement now that interest on the public debt is lessened from the fact that the Government carries $200,000,000 when it is only 10 per cent. of the whole debt. If any man in my country owed $1,000 and had $200, and that was all he had, and it was on deposit, nobody would think that would strengthen his credit very much, and there would not be very much of a rush after his paper. It is not that. It is the ability that the Government has to meet its notes when they become due, and when the people demand them, and it is the knowledge men have that the people will not demand them in excess of the ability of the Government to meet the demand, and that if they should the Government can bring every dollar of gold in the United States into its coffers in twenty-four hours by putting upon the market its bonds bearing 4 and 4½ per cent. This is what makes the credit of the Government, and it is not anything else. As I said before, 57 per cent. of the revenues paid at our customs ports are paid in gold; there is an immense sum of gold pouring every day into the Treasury, and if any sudden emergency arises the Government can use that to pay its debt and then sell bonds afterward to replace it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. HARRIS.) The question is on the amendment of the Committee on Finance.

Mr. TELLER. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BOOTH, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR.] If he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. PLUMB, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. WHYTE.] If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. WALKER, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Colorado, [Mr. HILL.] If he were present, I should vote "nay."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. ROLLINS. On this question the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] is paired with the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. BAILEY.] The Senator from Massachusetts would vote "yea," if he were present.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to say that on this question my colleague

[Mr. EDMUNDS] is paired with the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. RANSOM.] If my colleague were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. LOGAN. I am paired on the votes upon this bill with the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. VANCE.] I do not know how he would vote on this particular amendment, but I shall not vote on account of the pair.

The result was announced—yeas 26, nays 19; as follows:

So the amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was, in section 4, line 12, after the words "bonds or," to strike out "certificates" and insert "Treasury notes."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is agreed to if there be no objection.

Mr. TELLER. I object to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. TELLER. I move to amend the amendment of the committee by inserting, after the word "notes," the words "authorized by this act." Otherwise this redeeming and cancelling will apply to all Treasury notes. I suppose the object is to apply it to this class of Treasury notes.

Mr. ALLISON. There are no Treasury notes except these.

Mr. TELLER. That is a mistake. The greenbacks are called Treasury notes in the statutes.

Mr. ALLISON. Not at all.

Mr. BAYARD. No, they are termed "United States notes."

Mr. TELLER. They are called "Treasury notes," I think.

Mr. ALLISON. Nowhere in the statutes, I think.

Mr. TELLER. I can show the Senator.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Why object to the amendment of the Senator from Colorado? It will do no harm.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was, in section 4, line 13, after the words "bond and," to strike out "certificates" and insert "Treasury notes."

Mr. TELLER. That should be amended in the same way. I move to insert after the word "notes" the words "authorized by this act."

Mr. ALLISON. I suggest to my friend from Colorado that that is wholly unnecessary. The language is, "Treasury notes so purchased."

Mr. TELLER. Perhaps it is unnecessary in this case. I withdraw the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment is withdrawn, and the question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was to strike out section 5 of the bill in the following words:

From and after the 1st day of May, 1881, the 3 per cent. bonds authorized by the first section of this act shall be the only bonds receivable as security for national-bank circulation, or as security for the safe-keeping and prompt payment of the public money deposited with such banks; but when any such bonds deposited for the purposes aforesaid shall be designated for purchase or redemption by the Secretary of the Treasury, the banking association depositing the same shall have the right to substitute other issues of the bonds of the United States in lieu thereof: Provided, That no bond upon which interest has ceased shall be accepted or shall be continued on deposit as security for circulation or for the safe-keeping of the public money; and in case bonds so deposited shall not be withdrawn, as provided by law, within thirty days after interest has ceased thereon, the banking association depositing the same shall be subject to the liabilities and proceedings on the part of the Comptroller provided for in section 5234 of the Revised Statutes of the United States: And provided further, That section 4 of the act of June 20, 1874, entitled "An act fixing the amount of United States notes, providing for a redistribution of the national-bank currency, and for other purposes," be, and the same is hereby, repealed; and sections 5159 and 5160 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and the same are hereby, re-enacted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to this amendment of the committee.

Mr. PLUMB. Is the amendment subject to a division? Can it be divided?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In what way does the Senator from Kansas suggest a division of the question?

Mr. PLUMB. I suggest that the vote be first taken on striking out that part of the section down to the word "provided," in line 11.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair inclines to the opinion that the question may be divided if the Senator demands a division.

Mr. PLUMB. I should be glad to have a separate vote on striking out that part of the section.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the Chair will first put the question on striking out the first part of the section down to the proviso, in line 11. To this the Chair hears no objection.

Mr. McPHERSON. Will not some member of the committee explain the whole tenor and effect of the amendment striking out this section? For my part, I must confess that I have not been able to examine it critically, as I should like to do.

Mr. BECK. I hope the request of the Senator from New Jersey will be complied with by some other member of the committee. If by no other, I will explain why I think it ought not to be stricken out. I suppose some gentlemen can tell why it ought to be.

Mr. BAYARD. There is an amendment proposed by the Senate Committee on Finance that had better be read in connection with the amendment striking out section 5 of the bill as it passed the House. As the section came from the House it provides that after the 1st day of May next the bonds authorized by this act, 3 per cent. bonds, so described by the House, shall be the only bonds receivable as security for national-bank circulation. It therefore proposes to create a compulsory market for the bonds authorized by this act, and provides that the national banks or any persons hereafter proposing to invest capital under the law of the national-bank associations shall be obliged to deposit the bonds authorized by this act, and none others shall be received. That is the question presented to the Senate for its determination.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Let me ask the Senator, does that compulsion extend to bank circulation now existing, or only to such banks as shall hereafter be started or increase their circulation?

Mr. BAYARD. It would depend upon how much of the bonds bearing interest over 4 per cent. the banks now have deposited for circulation. The bonds belonging to the banks which are now pledged for circulation over 4½ per cent. will be paid off under the operation of this law. Then there is but one alternative left to them, either to wind up or to take the bonds provided for by this act. None others will do; they cannot bank on four percents in lieu of those to be authorized under this funding bill.

Mr. BECK. What is the Senator's statement?

Mr. BAYARD. I say all bonds that the banks have which are redeemable at the option of the United States must be replaced by these 3 per cent. bonds, or the banks must stop their operations. Only those bonds which are redeemable under the law by the option of the United States are to be funded into three percents. If Senators will turn to page 6 of the bill, and to section 6, they will find that the bonds authorized by the first section of this act shall be receivable as security for the circulation issued to the national banks; and then follows another provision, that hereafter only bonds and other interest-bearing securities of the United States shall be receivable as security under section 5153 of the Revised Statutes. That provision is an amendment proposed by the Finance Committee.

I think the Senate had better consider the whole action of the committee together. We did not agree that the 3 per cent. bonds should be the only bonds of the United States receivable as security for the circulation issued to national banks, but we agreed that they might be receivable just as others are, as the 4 percents. under the banking act. It was not considered by the committee a good feature that the bank should be compelled to buy bonds of this loan any more than any other class, but that the stockholders of the banks should be treated just the same as the rest of their fellow-citizens all over this country. Besides, the compulsory feature, in the view of the committee, did not in fact add to the strength of the bonds, but on the contrary it rather suggested a weakness. The bill as proposed to be amended by the committee enables these bonds to be receivable just as any other bonds, as a deposit for the currency to be issued at the ratio of 90 to 100 per cent. The provision further in regard to section 5153 is that whereas the banks which are now designated as depositories for public money can deposit as collateral security for public moneys temporarily left with them as agents of the Government other securities than bonds of the United States, we now propose, however, that where they do receive Government moneys they shall deposit as collateral security none but interest-bearing securities of the United States. The two sections which are re-enacted by the House proposition are 5159 and 5160. Those sections provided, under the national-bank act:

SEC. 5159. Every association, after having complied with the provisions of this title, preliminary to the commencement of the banking business, and before it shall be authorized to commence banking business under this title, shall transfer and deliver to the Treasurer of the United States any United States registered bonds, bearing interest, to an amount not less than $30,000 and not less than one-third of the capital stock paid in. Such bonds shall be received by the Treasurer upon deposit, and shall be by him safely kept in his office, until they shall be otherwise disposed of, in pursuance of the provisions of this title.

SEC. 5160. The deposits of bonds made by each association shall be increased as its capital may be paid up or increased, so that every association shall at all times have on deposit with the Treasurer registered United States bonds to the amount of at least one-third of its capital stock actually paid in.

The act of 1874 which was designed for the purpose of allowing the currency issued under the national-banking system to be retired at any time and the bonds taken up, repealed the two sections which I have just read, so that a bank desiring to return its currency to the Treasury could take back the whole of its bonds, and if it could not get its own circulating notes into its possession it would take United States notes for the full amount, and by depositing them be exonerated from any liability for the outstanding notes of the bank.

Mr. COCKRELL. I will read section 4 of the act of June 20, 1874:

That any association organized under this act, or any of the acts of which this is an amendment, desiring to withdraw its circulating notes, in whole or in part, may, upon the deposit of lawful money with the Treasurer of the United States in sums of not less than $9,000, take up the bonds which said association has on deposit with the Treasurer for the security of such circulating notes, which bonds shall be assigned to the bank in the manner specified in the nineteenth section of the national-bank act; and the outstanding notes of said association, to an amount equal to the legal-tender notes deposited, shall be redeemed at the Treasury of the United States and destroyed as now provided by law: Provided, That the amount of the bonds on deposit for circulation shall not be reduced below $50,000.

Mr. BAYARD. But it did not provide as to one-third of the capital. It changed it in that respect. That was the change. The later law provided for facility of the return of circulation by a bank and the release of its bonds. It is not necessary for me to state the history of the action. The House bill proposes to re-enact the two sections, which provided for the permanent retention of the bonds to the amount of one-third of a bank's capital with the Treasurer of the United States. The unexpected and unexampled premium upon the bonds of the United States created such an inducement to certain banks that they returned their currency, in order to take up their bonds and avail themselves of the extraordinary premium which was obtainable in the market, and in that way, not waiting to get their own currency, they took United States notes dollar for dollar and deposited the full amount, and upon that being deposited they received their bonds and sold their bonds and got the premium on them; but they did not continue the deposit of one-third of the amount of their capital in bonds because they had been released from that by the enactment of the law of 1874 which substituted the arbitrary sum of $50,000 in lieu of one-third of their capital, however much that capital might be.

The Finance Committee considered that we were facilitating this mode much more, and not interfering with the business of the country, by providing simply that the bonds authorized by this act should become at the will of the owners of any bank the basis for banking circulation, and that there was no necessity for the re-enactment of the two sections which I have read providing for the deposit of one-third of the capital stock, but there was sufficient protection under the law of 1874 to keep $50,000, in lieu of one-third of the capital, in bonds. That is the difference, and now it becomes a question as to whether your committee or the House is right in this respect. We considered that it was not necessary to re-enact these laws that had been repealed. We considered that the present provisions of law were sufficient to give ample security for the currency, which either had to have bonds pledged for it in the hands of the Treasury, or an equal amount, dollar for dollar, of United States notes placed in its hands.

Mr. McPHERSON. Let me ask the Senator a question, and I believe, if I understand it, it will be plain to everybody. The answer of the honorable Senator to my interrogatory, if I understand him aright, is that under the bill as it passed the House bank circulation is secured by 5 and 6 per cent. bonds, which we now propose to refund——

Mr. BAYARD. That is as a matter of fact under existing law.

Mr. McPHERSON. We propose to refund the 5 and 6 per cent. bonds which to-day are security for banking circulation. Will the honorable Senator tell me what proportion of the banking capital of the country is secured by the 5 and 6 per cent. bonds?

Mr. BECK. Two hundred and twelve million dollars.

Mr. McPHERSON. The $212,000,000 circulation under the bill as it passed the House would require to be secured by the bonds we now propose to issue, the 3 per cent. bonds we have agreed upon, and we should force the banks to accept them. They have not the power to elect to purchase 4 per cent. or 4½ per cent. bonds and pay the premium now demanded in the market and use those bonds as a basis for banking. In other words, it is only another way of forcing the banks to make a market for the bonds we propose to issue. Is not that it?

Mr. BAYARD. That is precisely it. I used the word "compulsory."

Mr. McPHERSON. But in the committee's amendment—to wit, in the sixth section of the bill—you propose to make these bonds receivable for bank circulation, but you have no compulsory clause.

Mr. BAYARD. That is just it.

Mr. SAULSBURY. As I understand, there is no compulsion in this proposed law, and I think it is eminently proper that the Government which pays to these banks the interest upon their capital should provide that when they come to the Treasury for the purpose of depositing their bonds to secure circulation, and it is the interest of the Government and the duty of the Government and of the people to require that they should deposit that security upon which the Treasury will have to pay the least amount of interest. These banking associations are receiving from the Treasury interest upon their capital. They have been very highly favored; they have been drawing from the Government a large amount of interest upon their capital, 90 per cent. of which they have had returned to them in the form of circulation. They have drawn at least $300,000,000 since 1864 and 1865 from the public Treasury upon their capital; and, as I said, when they hold as security for their bank circulation bonds that we propose to take up, it is no hardship upon these banks to say to them "hereafter when you replace these bonds which you have now to surrender, you shall replace them with bonds upon which the Government will have the least amount of interest to pay." In my opinion it is our duty to say to them that the people of this country shall no longer pay any large amount of interest upon the capital of the banks of the country. They have received ample protection from Congress. They have been making money, and have made large amounts of money in every section of this country. Take up the list of bank-stocks; there is scarcely a single national bank that has been in existence for ten years the capital stock of which has not advanced 50 per cent., and in many instances 100 per cent.

When I am called upon to vote what class of bonds the people of this country shall hereafter pay interest upon, held by these banks, I feel at liberty to say—nay, I feel bound to say—that they shall deposit that class of the public securities upon which the people of the country will have the least amount of interest to pay.

The fact is, that I have always thought, and I believe now, that the franchise granted to the banks is a full equivalent for the interest upon the capital which they deposit to secure their circulation. I believe we have been paying them a gratuity that they ought not to have received, for when the Government gave to them the valuable franchise of banking it was a full equivalent for the interest upon the bonds which they deposited with the Government to secure their circulation.

It used to be the habit when the old State banks had their notes in circulation, that they went to the Legislatures of the States and actually offered a bonus for a charter. We have been paying to these national banks and have paid to them in the last ten or fifteen years out of the public Treasury a bonus of $300,000,000 to furnish a part of the circulation of this country. I have no prejudice against the banks; I would not disturb any of their vested rights; but when the time arrives when they have got to replace the bonds to secure their circulation by a new issue of bonds, then I, as one of the representatives of the people, demand that they shall deposit that class of public securities upon which the people of this country have the least amount of interest to pay. It is not doing anything unjust to the banks, because the interest they receive upon their capital is a gratuity, and they have received from the Government a franchise that is worth all the interest upon their capital.

Mr. HEREFORD. Mr. President, as I understand this fifth section it simply dictates to the banks that are hereafter to be incorporated under the laws of the United States what securities they shall deposit with the General Government for their bank issues which are given out by the General Government. Has it come to this, that the Government of the United States has no power to say to these banking institutions what securities they shall deposit? What wrong is done to the banks that are hereafter to be incorporated for Congress to say, you shall deposit, for the bank issues that we are hereafter to give you, a certain class of securities? Who is injured? Is anybody injured?

Mr. President, this is the great lever power in this country. We have been told upon this floor that the national banks will co-operate to make this law that we are seeking to pass, ineffectual, to let it fall still-born; but if you keep the fifth section in the bill your bonds will be sold and floated. We have that right, we have that power; and I must express my surprise that any gentleman on this floor should deny the right, should deny the power, and should deny the justice of the exercise of that right and that power, to say what securities these national banks shall deposit for their issues.

For that reason, I am in favor of retaining the fifth section just as it came from the House. It is in favor of the people.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, I am not much wedded to the compulsory clause of the fifth section, and yet I am not disposed to reject all the good that is in the fifth section because of it. It is not a new feature, if it is called a compulsory loan, because by the act of 1864, section 21, I find that Congress made this provision:

That upon the transfer and delivery of bonds to the Treasurer, as provided in the foregoing section, the association making the same shall be entitled to receive from the Comptroller of the Currency circulating notes of different denominations, in blank, registered and countersigned as hereinafter provided, equal in amount to 90 per cent. of the current market value of the United States bonds so transferred and delivered, but not exceeding 90 per cent. of the amount of said bonds at the par value thereof, if bearing interest at a rate not less than 5 per cent. per annum; and at no time shall the total amount of such notes, issued to any such association, exceed the amount at such time actually paid in of its capital stock.

That was construed up to the very latest as meaning that no bond bearing less than 5 per cent. could be deposited for circulation, requiring bonds of that character to be held as security for circulation, and nothing bearing a less rate.

Mr. McPHERSON. Was there an issue of any other bonds at that time?

Mr. BECK. There was no other issue of bonds until 1870, and it limited the right to bonds of that character. What I meant to say was that it is no new thing that we should say what character of interest-bearing bonds shall be deposited by the national banks as security for their circulation. What I rose to speak about immediately was that portion of the fifth section which the committee seek to strike out, referred to by the chairman of the committee. I think the House was right in repealing the fourth section of the act of 1874 and restoring sections 5159 and 5160 of the Revised Statutes.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Will the Senator state the reason for that?

Mr. BECK. I will state the reason. Those sections were read a few minutes ago. I can explain the matter, I think, so that the Senator from Illinois will understand it fully. Under the provisions of sections 5159 and 5160 all the banks had to keep one-third of their capital stock in bonds of the United States. The act of 1874 repealed that and said no matter how much capital a bank had, $50,000 was all it should be required to keep in bonds. The Treasurer of the United States made a statement illustrative of the provisions of the law of 1864 in this way:

It is a provision in the interest of stockholders of national banks, who will, if it is re-enacted, upon failure of their bank find assets to the extent of at least one-third of its capital, which will reduce their individual liability to assessment to that extent. For instance, the National Bank of the State of Missouri failed in 1877; nominal capital, $2,500,000; all there was left, however, at date of failure was $50,000 in bonds on deposit in the office. Had the provision in question been in force, there would have been over $800,000 here.

Section 5160 provided that—

The deposit of bonds made by each association shall be increased as its capital may be paid up or increased, so that every association shall at all times have on deposit with the Treasurer registered United States bonds to the amount of at least one-third of its capital stock actually paid in. And any association that may desire to reduce its capital or to close up its business and dissolve its organization, may take up its bonds upon returning to the Comptroller its circulating notes in the proportion hereinafter required, or may take up any excess of bonds beyond one-third of its capital stock, and upon which no circulating notes have been delivered.

That the House seeks to restore. Section 4 of the act of June 20, 1874, relieved them from all that and authorized them to deposit legal-tender notes if they chose, and take up their bonds. Here is the effect of that; this is the way it operated: The Treasurer of the United States in his annual report, as in his testimony before the committee, said he thought great irregularities grew out of that, that the whole system was vicious. Mr. Gilfillan came before the committee and said that the House was right, that these two sections ought to be restored, and that under the fourth section of the act of 1874 the banks were gambling to suit themselves, drawing their bonds one day and putting them back the next; that they had two accounts running, one up and the other down; and this case stated by him illustrates it:

An example will better illustrate these operations. In January and February, 1875, a certain bank reduced its circulation from $308,490 to $45,000 by deposits of legal-tender notes. Between September 26, 1876, and May 26, 1877, and before that deposit was exhausted, it increased its circulation to $450,000. Between August 14 and September 10, 1877, it again reduced its circulation to $45,000. On September 19, 1877, nine days after completing the deposits for this reduction, it again began to take out additional circulation, although $402,550 of prior deposits remained in the Treasury, and by the 26th of that month its circulation had again been increased to $450,000. July 22, 1878, it, for the third time, reduced its circulation to $45,000, and in August and September, 1879, again increased to $450,000, at which it now remains, the balance of its former legal-tender deposit then in the Treasury being $112,615. From January 13, 1875, to the date of this report, $778,275 of its notes have been redeemed, of which only $40,700 were redeemed at the expense of the bank, although, during more than one-third of that period, it had outstanding and was deriving the benefit from the full amount of circulation which its capital authorized. The only assessments which have been made on the bank for the expenses of redeeming its notes were $24.74 in 1875, and $4.39 in 1878. At one time—

I wish the Senator from Illinois to notice this expression:

At one time there were in actual circulation $852,550 of its notes, although the highest amount ever borne on its books was $450,000.

The highest amount of bonds it ever had was $500,000, and yet it had an actual circulation out of $852,550. That the Treasurer says is an improper thing to do. That I think every Senator will say is an improper condition of things, and the system is improper that allows it.

Mr. BAYARD. But I will say that while its notes were outstanding the bank had deposited dollar for dollar an equal amount of United States notes, so that they were brought in when the others were out.

Mr. BECK. I am coming to that directly. United States notes were deposited, but with all the care that Congress seems to have taken to have only 90 per cent. as much circulation out as there were bonds deposited, and requiring them for a long time to bear 5 per cent. interest or more than that, and with authority to the Secretary if the bonds ever fell below par to increase their amount so as to keep up the 10 per cent. margin of bonds more than circulating notes, during this time this First National Bank of New York did this, and perhaps others were doing the same thing. That was the case with the First National Bank of New York, of which I am speaking. They had out $880,000 of circulation, and there was no margin at all other than the legal-tender notes of the United States, no bonds held as security for it, no margin of security, simply United States notes and nothing more. The provision of the House makes that impossible. First, it requires one-third of all their capital to be held in bonds. Then it prevents them from taking out United States notes and depositing them and taking in their bonds, and having the condition of things that existed in this case.

Recollect that each time they deposited legal-tenders and called for more notes the new notes had to be issued to them, and the Government of the United States paid the expense of doing that. The bank paid but $32 one year, I believe, and $5 the next toward that. All these changes were made at the expense of the United States or if not wholly paid by the United States out of the fund provided by the banks, and banks other than this one. The Treasurer, I think, very properly said in regard to that matter:

Under the construction placed upon the law, banks which have thus reduced their circulation have been permitted to increase it again as often and as largely as they chose, whether their legal-tender deposits were exhausted or not. Although the exact amount cannot be ascertained, it is safe to say that many millions of dollars of additional circulation have been issued under the general provisions of the national currency act to banks which were still reducing their circulation under the act of June 20, 1874. The consequence has been that the new notes thus issued have, to a large extent, speedily been presented to the Treasury for redemption out of the legal-tender deposit. Banks which have applied in vain to the Treasurer for the surrender of their legal-tender deposits, have accomplished the same object by obtaining new circulation. The cost of printing the new notes thus issued is borne by the United States, so that the Government, though not deriving the remotest benefit from the transaction, has been obliged to bear the whole expense of their issue, and a part of the expense of their redemption, simply to enable a bank to do by indirection what it was not permitted to do directly. In several instances banks have repeated the operation of reducing and increasing their circulation several times within a brief period, taking up their bonds and selling them, it would appear, whenever the premium constituted a sufficient inducement, and increasing their circulation again whenever bonds could be bought at better rates, the United States all the while redeeming their notes at its own expense or that of the other banks, and issuing others, also at its own expense, whenever called upon by them.

That system the Treasurer of the United States very properly says is vicious; it is unjust to the United States, and the provisions of law, which are contained in the sections to which I have just referred, ought to be restored, so that when the banks seek to retire their circulation they shall themselves bring in their own circulation. That may be a slow and tedious process; but, perhaps, in some contingencies it may be very well to have it a little slow and tedious. Under the present provision, the banks in the United States, if they see fit to combine, in one night could draw in all their circulation, contract the currency to suit themselves, and no man could prevent them. If they have to pick up their own notes all over the country, then it becomes a different operation; and why should they not do that themselves, instead of requiring the United States to do it for them?

I think the Senate will find it difficult to see any reason for it. The House could see no reason for it; and, while the committee disagree with me in my view in regard to it, I hope the Senate will not. These provisions of the fifth section I trust will be retained. If Senators will read the statement made by Mr. Gilfillan before our committee, I think they will be convinced. I admit that Mr. Knox differed with him, but I would a good deal rather take the opinion of the Treasurer of the United States than that of the Comptroller of the Currency on such a point, because the latter naturally leans to the great corporations whose representative he necessarily is, whereas the former, looking solely to the Treasury, to the accounts, to their proper adjustment, to the fair management and the good of the whole Treasury Department, without having any bias or partiality to give any corporation an advantage, I think is the fair man to follow.

I can see no harm in requiring the banks to do what the fifth section requires them to do. I can see very serious evils if they are allowed to go on, as the Treasurer shows they have done and may do again whenever a profitable time for gambling comes; and it may come. I hope it will not.

I trust the House provisions will be retained, for the reasons I have briefly stated. I do not want to take time.

Mr. WALLACE. I agreed with my brethren of the committee in their change of the fifth section of the House bill. I did not believe in the policy of coercion of the national banks, which I thought it practically embodied. They have never been favorites of mine; they are not now; the reverse of this is true; but this is a funding bill, and this section properly has no place in it; it does not legitimately belong to the subject embraced in this bill, and it will be charged that it is placed here simply for the purpose of forcing the national banks into the adoption of this class of securities as the only one to be utilized for their purposes. My view about it is that pecuniary advantage and freedom of action by capital would be infinitely better than apparent coercion. These organizations are the only money organizations now recognized by law in this country, and we must treat them as such and remember that almost the entire business interests of the people are involved in the question before us now. The results from this bill may seriously affect every business interest, and we should move with care. We may have grave difficulties if we bring contraction by compelling the banks to take these 3 per cent. bonds or go into liquidation, as I fear many of them would.

There are $210,000,000 of our bonds now held by the national banks of fives and sixes to mature this year, and which we hope to refund under the provisions of this bill. They are a majority of the bonds which the banks now hold as security for circulation. They must be replaced with the three percents alone if this coercive feature remains in the bill. By retaining this section you face the contingency of forcing the retirement of $211,000,000 of your banking capital—which may become a very grave matter for business men. I refer Senators to the statement of the Comptroller of the Currency, found in his interview with the Finance Committee. There are $211,000,000 due in 1881, held by the banks, and to be compulsorily converted into three percents if we adopt this section. If they decline to convert them, their only choice would be to go into liquidation. By this policy we compel the banks to contract their currency if they will not exchange their 5 and 6 per cent. bonds for these 3 per cent. bonds. I want to take no such responsibility in the present condition of the business of this country. I fear the possible results that may follow.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. If the Government pays the 5 and 6 per cent. bonds, the banks will buy the others. That is all.

Mr. WALLACE. The Senator from Illinois certainly understands me, that it is optional with the banks whether they continue their business or go out thereof, and thus withdraw their currency. The Senator thinks that no difficulty will arise on that question. I refer him to the report of the interview of the Finance Committee with the Secretary of the Treasury and the Comptroller of the Currency. When they were called before us and this question was asked them they said the inevitable result would be to contract the currency.

I believe in a 3 per cent. bond; I believe in the policy of having the banks take these bonds just as soon as we can get them to take them, but I do not believe in a coercive policy on the moneyed institutions of the country. I believe it would be a ruinous policy for us, an unwise and dangerous policy.

Now, as to the other provisions of this section; section 4 of the act of June 20, 1874, is to be repealed by the House bill, and sections 5159 and 5160 of the Revised Statutes to be re-enacted. What is this proposition? Let us see. The Comptroller of the Currency says of it:

> Previous to the passage of this act of 1874, a national bank desiring to reduce its capital was obliged to pay a premium for its own notes and send them in for destruction before it could accomplish such reduction; and, if sections 5159 and 5160, Revised Statutes, should again become the law, no bank in the country whose capital should become impaired could continue its business unless it should make an assessment upon its shareholders for the purpose of restoring such capital under the restrictions of the act and retire its circulation, and continue as a legally organized bank.

Now, what is the difference in principle—not in effect, but the difference in principle—between the statements of the Treasurer of the United States and the Comptroller of the Currency—between the position of the Senator from Kentucky and that of the committee on this question? His doctrine is that of paternal government, that the Federal Government are to care for all the depositors of every bank in this country; that we are to see that their deposits are secure and the business of their agents, the directors, well managed. I want to go in the other direction; to let every business interest manage itself and simply and only to see that the circulation of the notes is secured so that the note-holder is protected. That is quite enough for us to take care of. Let banking stand upon the same basis that the legal profession, or making flour, or making bricks or merchandising, or insurance, or any other business in this country stands upon individual good management, and to let the men who elect the directors of the bank, who are the shareholders of the bank, see that its business is well conducted and well managed.

If I understand the doctrines of the political organization to which I belong, we are not for paternity in government, but are for individual control. So far as this system of banking is concerned, it is our duty to protect the note-holder to the utmost, to see that his security is absolute. The protection of the depositor is an entirely different question, and he must look to the men he trusts with his money; we have nothing to do with him. So far as the national-banking organization has regard to its deposits, I believe in allowing the banks to stand upon their own basis of good or bad management. The Government of the United States should only care for the safety of the circulation, the security of the note-holder, and the uniformity of the notes. These are the two great features of the national-banking system to which I yield my support. The protection of the depositor, it seems to me, is an entirely different question, and stands, as it should stand, entirely on the confidence of the depositor in the business management of the bank.

The two sections which are proposed to be restored provide for a large deposit of bonds for the protection of the depositors. We are to care for the stockholders; we are to take care of their interests and see that they elect men to manage their business providently and well, to have our agents and examiners paid to travel the country to see that everything connected with the bank is properly managed and conducted as the Federal Government thinks is right. I do not believe in that theory. I would prune this out of the system if I could. On the contrary, I think this organization ought to be held simply to circulation and security therefor, and thus be brought down to the lowest, narrowest limits possible. Our aim, I believe, should be simply to require security for the paper circulation that the people have to take and what necessarily flows from this. Does the act of 1874 do that? Unquestionably it does. No bank can take up any of its circulating notes without depositing in the Treasury legal-tender notes in their room, and thus the security is fixed beyond question for every piece of paper that is issued by the Government as bank paper.

The case of the Bank of Missouri and the case of the First National Bank of New York are exceptional cases, in which the stockholders stood idly by, supposing that their agents, the men whom they elected to take care of their money and manage the bank, were doing right by them, while they were either neglecting their business or cheating them all the time. Are we to protect the owners of the stock and the depositors also? Are we to make banking a business that the Government shall protect? That is not democratic doctrine. I would reverse that rule if I could. The only thing this Government ought to have to do with the national banks is to secure the people a uniform and a safe currency, and let the shareholders take care that the men who manage their business are honest and capable.

Our business is to protect the bill-holder, and let the men who own the capital and control the organization care for those who make their deposits. Men who make deposits of their money will be safe when they depend on business management and not on paternal government.

This idea of security, by the deposit of a large amount of bonds for the protection of the depositors, is simply paternity in government. If we secure the note-holder we are doing all that ought to be required of us. Let us lop off the excrescences of this system, if we can confine our supervision to circulation and security therefor, and allow the business of the bank, so far as deposits are concerned, to be guarded by the men who make the deposits and own the capital. Let them see that the directors are men in whom the community can have confidence and trust. Let them see that the business of the bank is managed as a careful merchant's business ought to be managed. Let them have their eyes open, and then there will come no such difficulties as those to which the Senator from Kentucky calls attention.

Mr. BECK. Only one word. The Senator from Pennsylvania is very much afraid of paternal government, and yet a thousand of these banks are under such government now. By the provisions of the act of 1874, the repeal of which is now asked, a certain number of bonds are required to be kept in the Treasury by the smaller banks. There is that paternal surpervision over the smaller banks now, and it is retained in this bill; and the Senator is complaining that I seek to put it over the large ones. It is only the large ones who are allowed to gamble. The small ones have to keep their bonds in the Treasury, and the restoration of these two sections would not affect them at all. They have each to keep up the $50,000 any way. As many of them have a capital of only $100,000, and some of them not over $50,000, the paternal supervision is rather over the small ones, while all the large ones are released, and they are allowed to gamble as they please. That is the distinction.

Mr. EATON. How large was the capital of that New York bank spoken of?

Mr. BECK. Four hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

Mr. EATON. Do you call that a large capital?

Mr. BECK. It is a good deal larger than most of the banks in the West and throughout the country have, which do not exceed $100,000 usually.

Mr. EATON. It is larger than $100,000, I know, but I supposed it was an immense thing from what has been said.

Mr. BECK. It was an immense thing for a bank with $450,000 capital to have $880,000 of circulation out.

Mr. EATON. I do not think it ever had that much.

Mr. BECK. The Treasurer of the United States said it had, in making his official report, and the Comptroller of the Currency said it had.

Mr. EATON. My impression is that there was an error, and when you come to examine the facts you will find that the First National Bank of New York had no such circulation.

Mr. BECK. Then the Comptroller of the Currency and the Treasurer of the United States and all their official statements are false. Nobody has contradicted them until the Senator from Connecticut thought it was his duty to do so. We had it officially from both of them, and I read their statements in the hearing of the Senate.

Now, another thing. We have required all the State banks to go out of existence; we have taxed them out of existence. The Senator from Pennsylvania does not propose to restore them, I presume, and we have made the national-bank system the only place where men can make deposits; we have taxed all the other banks out of existence; we have given them a monopoly, and why should we not throw safeguards around them? I do not think there is any vice in the section, but I think it is a proper protection.

Mr. McDONALD. The more I examine the provisions of the fifth section of this bill the more I am satisfied that it is right. I think the Senator from Kentucky has quite clearly demonstrated the propriety of restoring sections 5159 and 5160 of the Revised Statutes.

As to the part of section 5 which relates to the sale of the bonds provided for in this bill, I do not understand that it is placing any unfair or any unreasonable burden upon these institutions. I do not exactly like the term of the Senator from Pennsylvania, that this is an attempt to "coerce" these banks. In the first place, it provides that—

> From and after the 1st day of May, 1881, the 3 per cent. bonds authorized by the first section of this act shall be the only bonds receivable as security for national-bank circulation or as security for the safe-keeping and prompt payment of the public money deposited with such banks.

That provides for two classes of cases, the security of the circulation and the security of the moneys the United States may deposit with these banks as Government depositories. I suppose no one will question the right of the Government to prescribe what kind of security may be taken from its depositaries; and if it sees proper to require a certain class of its own bonds, there is certainly nothing improper in that. Banking institutions need not receive the Government deposits if the security which they are required to give is not convenient to them. They certainly will not receive them if it is not beneficial to them to do so; but I apprehend in receiving and paying out the Government revenues as depositories of the Government, holding them frequently for months, using them as a part of their discounting capital, there will be no difficulty in finding plenty of banking institutions in this country that would be very willing to put up this class of securities for such a privilege.

Mr. WALLACE. Does the Senator know that the law now is that securities for deposits of the Government money may be in other kind of securities than bonds—mortgages for instance?

Mr. McDONALD. I understand that. I say we have a perfect right to change the nature of that security and make it better if we think proper.

Mr. BAYARD. Section 6 proposed by the committee does that very thing.

Mr. McDONALD. Yes, sir; the Committee on Finance have retained in a subsequent part of this bill the very provision making that requirement. As to requiring bonds hereafter to be deposited as security for bank capital to be of this issue, I see no hardship in that whatever. We at present require that bonds of the United States shall be the only securities received for bank circulation, we discriminate in favor of Government bonds. Now, may we not select of the class of Government bonds that shall be deposited, and when we are putting forth the bonds provided for in this bill, have we not a right to call in to the aid of the Government the assistance of these banks for the purpose of placing them?

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator allow me to ask, for information, upon what principle can the Government of the United States, in disposing of its bonds, by law declare that any individual shall purchase those bonds, a bank being a corporation on the same footing as an individual?

Mr. McDONALD. If it was nothing more than an individual, perhaps the Senator's question would be more difficult to answer.

Mr. LOGAN. I will use the word "person" and say "corporation or person." Upon what principle has the Government a right to require of any person that he shall be the purchaser of its indebtedness?

Mr. McDONALD. I shall answer that question in the course of the few remarks which I propose to submit, not categorically, and perhaps not to the satisfaction of the Senator from Illinois, but to my own satisfaction.

Mr. President, these banking institutions are not mere private corporations. If they were that, I should deny the power of this Government to grant charters to them. They are, so far as their connection with the Government is concerned, its fiscal agents. When the constitutionality of the Bank of the United States was under consideration in the case of McCulloch vs. The State of Maryland, the decision of the Supreme Court sustaining its constitutionality rested upon the sole ground that it was created as a fiscal agent of the Government. It was not claimed in that decision that Congress possessed the power to create private corporations, moneyed corporations, for the mere transaction of private business; but it was in connection with the Government in its fiscal operations, in the management of its monetary affairs, that it was held to be a proper instrumentality, decided to be so by the Congress that created it, and sustained by the Supreme Court upon that ground, and upon that ground alone. And when the banking law was passed, authorizing the present banking associations to be organized, it was with a view of creating fiscal agents to aid the Government in its moneyed operations, mainly for the purpose of creating a market for Government bonds, reserving in the act the right of alteration or repeal.

These banking institutions to-day are acting as the fiscal agents of the Government in receiving the public moneys and in disbursing them. So far, it is beneficial to them, because it strengthens their credit, it furnishes them with means to carry on their business from time to time. The Government deposit in the vaults of banks is not dead capital there, but it is used for the private benefit and advantage of those who are interested in the banking association, who are its stockholders, its shareholders. It is very willing to act as the Government agent in matters of that sort; but when called upon to aid and assist the Government in placing its securities, then it insists upon making a profit, then it retires into its place of "private banking institution."

What more important interest has the Government in connection with its fiscal affairs than to properly handle and place its securities? And here are over two thousand banking institutions holding their charters simply because the Government had a right to create fiscal agents; and it is said to be a coercive measure to ask them to take or place one particular class of our securities, which it is important for us to place now, as a security for the circulating notes that they are authorized to receive and use in their private business.

Mr. PADDOCK. Is the Senator prepared to express an opinion that a single one of the refunding operations of the Government would have been successful without the hearty co-operation of all these banks?

Mr. McDONALD. I do not know, sir. I am simply speaking now about our right to say that hereafter banking institutions that are called upon or desire to deposit bonds as a security for circulation shall deposit a particular class of bonds. That is what I am talking about now. Those who hold securities at present that do not fall due within the next twelve months are in no manner affected by this, and those who do hold such securities will get the full amount that is due upon those securities by their redemption, but they will have to replace them, if they carry on their business of banking, with this particular class. That is all that is required.

Mr. EATON. Will my friend permit me to ask him will there be any other securities of the United States which they can employ?

Mr. McDONALD. Yes, sir.

Mr. EATON. What?

Mr. McDONALD. The four percents and four-and-a-half percents.

Mr. EATON. But they have those after we have redeemed all that are due—if I may use the word "due"—all that the Government has a right to pay in 1881. Suppose my friend and myself were the proprietors of a bank in Indiana of a million dollars' capital—I wish we were; it is hardly supposable in our case; but suppose we associated our friend from Illinois [Mr. DAVIS] with us, then we might—suppose we had a million dollars in bonds not due until 1907, does the Government propose to pay those bonds?

Mr. McDONALD. No.

Mr. EATON. Then why undertake to use the word "compulsory?" If the bank goes on at all it must go on with the new issue of bonds; there is no other way.

Mr. McDONALD. If they are bound to use the new issue of bonds, as a matter of course they are not coerced. This does not take from them the securities they have until they become redeemable.

Mr. EATON. I understand that perfectly. Then you are setting up a man of straw and knocking him down.

Mr. McDONALD. Not at all.

Mr. ALLISON. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. McDONALD. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. Admitting what the Senator says, that we have a right to make rules and regulations for the government of these corporations, they being fiscal agents of the Government, should not those rules be uniform in their operation and character? And if so, have we not just as good a right to say that a bank which now holds 4 and 4½ per cent. bonds shall after the 1st of May only hold these bonds, as we have to say to a bank that now holds 5 per cent. bonds: "You must hold these three percents?"

Mr. McDONALD. We have just as good a right, and the Senate in 1870 did say to the banking institutions of this country, so far as it had the power to say, that they should take the bonds provided for in the act of 1870 by a given date, and surrender the bonds they then held, dollar for dollar, without expense to the United States, or if they did not do so they must go into liquidation.

Mr. ALLISON. Now, then, do we not discriminate in favor of one portion of these banks against another portion if we simply apply this to those banks having bonds maturing now?

But I want to call the attention of the Senator particularly to the phraseology of this bill. I want his construction of the first clause to see whether or not this provision applies only to banks who now hold bonds maturing or redeemable and to the banks hereafter organized, or whether the word "receivable" would not be fairly construed by the Treasurer of the United States to mean that after that particular date the bonds provided for in this act, and those bonds only, shall be used as security for national-bank circulation; and if so, then it will be impossible under the provision of this bill to ever increase the national-bank circulation beyond the amount that may be issued under this law.

Mr. McDONALD. The Senator from Iowa has answered his own question, and shown very clearly by his answer to it that it does not and cannot fairly receive the construction he suggests. The provision as it came from the House is:

> From and after the 1st day of May, 1881, the 3 per cent. bonds authorized by the first section of this act shall be the only bonds receivable as security for national-bank circulation.

As a matter of course, it can only apply to bonds tendered after that time, either for an increase of circulation to banks already authorized, or for the circulation of banking institutions hereafter created and formed under the law, for there is but $400,000,000 of bonds authorized by this act, and that is less than the amount of bonds deposited for the present circulation of national banks, and would require a reduction now.

Mr. ALLISON. Oh, no. There are only $356,000,000 of bonds now held as security for circulation; or about that.

Mr. McDONALD. Then this issue is but little more than the bonds at present on deposit, but they are "receivable," not those that have been received; and the subsequent clause shows very clearly that that is the meaning of it, because it goes on to say:

> But when any such bonds deposited for the purposes aforesaid shall be designated for purchase or redemption by the Secretary of the Treasury, the banking association depositing the same shall have the right to substitute other issues of the bonds of the United States in lieu thereof: Provided, That no bond upon which interest has ceased shall be accepted or shall be continued on deposit as security for circulation or for the safe-keeping of the public money.

Now, I suppose the Senator from Indiana would not contend that the Government would receive that as a security for circulation.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] said a few moments ago in debate that it was sufficient for these banks to hold these bonds, receiving no interest on them.

Mr. McDONALD. The Senator from Iowa quotes the Senator from Delaware, but he does not state his position.

Mr. BECK. While the Senator from Indiana is being interrupted, allow me to ask if it is not the fact that the fours and four-and-a-halfs now held by the banks will continue undisturbed by the passage of this act?

Mr. McDONALD. That is my opinion.

Mr. BECK. That is absolutely so.

Mr. McDONALD. Entirely so, in my opinion.

Mr. BECK. Then is not this the fact, that we have nearly $750,000,000 of four percents, and $250,000,000 of four-and-a-halfs, and if these gentlemen see fit to exchange fives and sixes for fours and four-and-a-halfs before the 1st day of May, they can hold them to the whole extent of their circulation undisturbed by this act, if they prefer it?

Mr. McDONALD. This simply calls on these banks to perform what, under the circumstances, is not a very onerous duty in connection with their office as fiscal agents of the Government. They were created, so far as the public is concerned, for that purpose, and not for their mere private gain. That is an incident which they enjoy under the franchise the Government has given them for public uses. The franchise was not given them for a private purpose, but for the public benefit, for their aid and assistance as agents of the Government in managing its fiscal affairs; and this is no very great burden to them, because these bonds will be worth what they pay for them, and will be the equivalent to them of the bonds now outstanding. If there should be any difference, as there would undoubtedly be, in the price, because the premium would have to be paid upon these other bonds, they would have to pay the difference between the value of a 3 per cent. bond and a 4 and a 4½. So it simply does this, and nothing more, it uses them in the very line for which they were created, to act as the agents of the Government in effecting this purpose, without cost to us and without detriment to the banks. That is all there is of it. It simply cuts off from them the chance of private speculation growing out of the matter of negotiating these bonds, and that I say they ought not to complain of.

Mr. McPHERSON. May I ask the Senator a question? He says in effect it really amounts to nothing. In that I concur, because it certainly makes but little difference in effect whether you have a 3 per cent. bond at par or a 4 per cent. at a premium; but is it not in fact under the law compulsion?

Mr. McDONALD. Of course it is.

Mr. McPHERSON. If I desire to go into a banking operation in the State of Indiana with a capital of $100,000, if I elect to purchase bonds bearing 4 per cent. interest, for which I pay to-day at the rate of 113, why should I by any legislation of Congress be prevented from using that bond which Congress by its own laws makes?

Mr. McDONALD. If the Senator were to do that in his individual right, I say there should be nothing to prevent him. If he was the president of a State corporation created by State law, exercising simply such powers as were conferred upon him by State authority, I should say there would be no such right on the part of the Government; but when he is a member of an agency created by the Government for its benefit, as well as for the benefit of those who may be engaged in the association, I say we have a right to put upon it such responsibilities and such burdens, if you please, as are consistent with the purposes for which it was created. It is not a mere private corporation. If it stood as the gentleman suggests, I would say that the charter under which it was acting was void for want of authority on the part of Congress to grant it. The Supreme Court, in the decision which has been referred to again and again, would have so said in regard to the Bank of the United States if it was created for the sole purpose of transacting business as a private banking corporation, and not as one of the agents of the Government in its fiscal affairs.

Mr. EATON. Mr. President, as a member of this body I propose to do what is just and right toward all the business corporations of the country. There are a great many banks in my little State. Members of the Senate will remember that before the war no State in this Union had better banks, more thoroughly organized banks, than the State of Connecticut; that her bills were good in New Orleans, all through the West, and all over this broad land.

Now, my friend from Indiana talks about a fiscal agent of the Government. What did the Government do? It said to the banks of Connecticut, "Come in here, or we will destroy you." It taxed them out of existence, unless they would accept the provisions of this general banking law, banks no better to-day than they were then—the old Hartford, the Phœnix, the Connecticut River, and a half dozen others that I might name—banks whose own bills, I undertake to say, were better than the bills of the Government are now, because, in addition to the bonds of the Government, they held money of equal value in the bank.

Mr. McDONALD. I wish to state to my friend from Connecticut that the banks of Connecticut were no better than the banks of Indiana. Our banks continued to pay specie long after the Government ceased to pay it.

Mr. EATON. I am speaking of the institutions of my own State, and not of those of any other State. I have not said that they were even better in Connecticut than they were in Indiana. They were as good then as they are now. I am under no obligations to the banks in my State; I do not own a dollar of stock in any one of them, and never did. They are not managed by men belonging to the same political organization to which I belong; and I rather think if the chairmen of the two great national parties of the country were called here and put under oath, you would find which of them received the larger subscription from nearly every bank in my State and which did not. Enough to say that I have no particular friendship for these institutions; but I do not intend that they shall be wronged or injured by the enactment of any law that I can prevent. They are sound, well-managed, and managed by honorable gentlemen.

And now let me see if the amendment which is proposed by the committee is not all that this Government ought to demand of their fiscal agents. I will take the proposed section 6:

> That the bonds authorized by the first section of this act shall be receivable as security for the circulation issued to the national banks; and hereafter only bonds and other interest-bearing securities of the United States shall be receivable as security under section 5153 of the Revised Statutes.

What more do you want? My friend from Indiana with great fairness admitted, when I questioned him, that if three or four of us had now a banking charter, and if we had the four percents that were not payable till 1907, we could not be compelled to change them. The bill, he says, does not compel that. I do not know that it does, but I have some doubt about it. I have great confidence in my friend as a lawyer; but that section, whether it accomplishes it or not, was drawn for the very purpose of doing it. I think my friend from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIAMS] says in his opinion it does, and, therefore, he wants it. That is my opinion, and I vote against it. There I differ with my honorable friend from Kentucky. I say it would be bad faith in the Government toward these institutions, not that it created but that it took by the throat after they were created by the States.

Now, what else do you want? We say here all banks organized hereafter shall take these securities of the United States. That is right; that is just. If we three choose to go into banking hereafter we know that we go in upon the 3 per cent. securities of the United States. That is just; that is fair. A mere statement of the case, it seems to me, would satisfy every member of the Senate.

Then, as to the idea of my honorable friend from Kentucky, the senior Senator, [Mr. BECK,] who desires that one-third of the capital stock of these institutions shall be placed somewhere for the purpose of protecting depositors, what has the Government of the United States to do with regard to business in the State of Minnesota between the people of Minnesota and the shareholders or stockholders of a banking institution? Nothing. If they violate any law of the land and become criminal, let them be punished. It is the province of the United States, having assumed the duty, having taken this power out of the hands of the several State governments, now to protect the bill-holder; that is all. To that extent I go, and no further. The bill-holder will be protected, amply protected.

The corporation starts with a million dollars capital and it buys a million dollars of these 3 per cent. bonds, it takes out $900,000 of currency for the purpose of circulation, and so long as the bonds of the United States are good the bill-holder is protected, and that is the end, in my judgment, of what the Government of the United States ought to do. It would be so, as my friend from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] suggests, if the bonds were at 1 per cent.; it would be so if they were at no per cent. so long as the credit of the United States was good and the Government of the United States paid its dues.

I oppose the House bill and am in favor of the amendment of the committee, and hope it will pass.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. President, it seems manifest that we shall not get a vote upon this measure this evening, and I would suggest to the Senator from Delaware, who has charge of the bill, that he propose to take a vote at a fixed hour to-morrow by general consent.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator from Delaware is not here. I trust the Senator from Rhode Island will wait until he comes in before making the proposition.

Several SENATORS. Let us vote!

Mr. ALLISON. We can vote on this section now.

Mr. ANTHONY. I would rather vote than adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. GARLAND in the chair.) The question is on the amendment striking out the fifth section down to the word "provided" in line 11.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I ask for the yeas and nays on that.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. PLUMB, (when Mr. BOOTH's name was called.) I am requested to state that the Senator from California, [Mr. BOOTH,] whose name has just been called, is paired with the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR.] The Senator from California would vote against the amendment of the committee.

Mr. KIRKWOOD, (when Mr. BROWN's name was called.) Upon this section I am paired with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. BROWN.] If he were present, he would vote against striking out, and I would vote to strike out. I am paired with him on all votes upon this section.

Mr. McMILLAN, (when the name of Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, was called.) The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. CAMERON] is paired with the Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. KELLOGG.] If they were here, the Senator from Wisconsin would vote for the amendment reported by the committee and the Senator from Louisiana against it.

Mr. FERRY. My colleague [Mr. BALDWIN] is paired with the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. SAULSBURY.]

Mr. HARRIS. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. BAILEY] is paired with the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES.] If my colleague were here, he would vote "nay."

Mr. LOGAN, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. VANCE.] I do not know how he would vote on this question. If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. PLUMB, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. WHYTE.] If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. ROLLINS, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. WITHERS.] If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. WALKER, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Colorado, [Mr. HILL.] If he were present, I should vote "nay."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. FARLEY. My colleague [Mr. BOOTH] requested me to announce his pair with the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR.] If my colleague were here, he would vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 19, nays 21; as follows:

YEAS—19.

So the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on striking out the rest of the section.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next amendment of the Committee on Finance will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to insert, as section 6, the following:

That the payment of any of the bonds hereby authorized——

Mr. INGALLS. Should not the words "and notes" be inserted there, after "bonds?"

Mr. BAYARD. The words "said terms of one and" were stricken out. It was a clerical error that it should have been inserted.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert:

SEC. 6. That the payment of any of the bonds hereby authorized, after the expiration of the five years, shall be made in amounts to be determined from time to time by the Secretary of the Treasury, at his discretion, the bonds so to be paid to be distinguished and described by the dates and numbers, beginning for each successive payment with the bonds of each class last dated and numbered; of the time of which intended payment or redemption the Secretary of the Treasury shall give public notice, and the interest on the particular bonds so selected at any time to be paid shall cease at the expiration of thirty days from the date of such notice.

Mr. INGALLS. Have the words "and Treasury notes" been inserted after "bonds" in the first line of the section?

Mr. WALLACE. This section only relates to the bonds; it has no reference whatever to Treasury notes.

Mr. INGALLS. It appears in the second line that the "terms of one and five years" are mentioned.

Mr. BAYARD. Those words are stricken out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Those words are stricken out. The question is on the amendment to insert the matter just read.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment reported by the Committee on Finance was to insert as section 7 the following:

SEC. 7. That the bonds authorized by the first section of this act shall be receivable as security for the circulation issued to the national banks; and hereafter only bonds and other interest-bearing securities of the United States shall be receivable as security under section 5153 of the Revised Statutes.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments of the Committee on Finance are disposed of.

Mr. ALLISON. I have an amendment which I propose to offer to the bill, which is printed. I ask that it be submitted to the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Iowa will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. After section 4 it is proposed to insert——

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Has section 7 been adopted, "that the bonds authorized by the first section of this act shall be receivable as security for the circulation issued to the national banks," &c.?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That has been adopted.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Section 5 covers that.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I have an amendment I should like to offer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois make any motion?

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Not now.

Mr. TELLER. It seems to me it is pretty evident that we cannot finish this bill to-night; there are several amendments yet to be acted on; and therefore I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. BAYARD. I hope the Senator will withdraw the motion for a moment.

Mr. TELLER. I withdraw it.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I offer an amendment——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Iowa will be reported.

Mr. ALLISON. What has become of my amendment?

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I should really like to know from the chairman of the Committee on Finance, with the fifth section remaining in this bill, what is the necessity of the seventh section, which has been added?

Mr. BAYARD. I think the only operative part of that will be the last part.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Of course. The fore part certainly is not.

Mr. BAYARD. The last part I think is important and useful. The proposition is that bonds and other interest-bearing securities shall be receivable as security. That is a new feature of the law.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Why not allow the other portion to be struck out? There is no necessity for it. The bill is bungling with it in after the fifth section has been adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois make any motion? If not, the different amendments now upon the table will be taken up in their order, and the first one is the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. ALLISON.] The Secretary will report it.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. The amendment offered by me was the first offered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's colleague had offered an amendment, which is already on the table as the Chair is informed.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Mine had been offered and printed before that of my colleague was offered. My colleague has called attention to his just now, but my amendment was first offered, I believe.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. First offered, but not first printed. That is the real truth. Your colleague's was first printed.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. That may be. I am not sufficiently familiar with the rules of order to know which is entitled to precedence.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Iowa indicate where his amendment comes in, and then the Chair will determine which shall have precedence?

Mr. KIRKWOOD. It comes in after the section providing for the issuance of these bonds. I do not think it is of very great importance at what particular place it comes in now. Let it come in immediately following section 1.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the end of section 1 it is proposed to insert:

It shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, to authorize public subscriptions, at not less than par, to be received at all depositories of the United States, and at all national banks, and such other banks as he may designate, for the bonds and for the Treasury notes herein provided for, for thirty days before he shall contract for or award any portion of said bonds or Treasury notes to any syndicate of individuals or bankers, or otherwise than under such public subscriptions; and if it shall happen that more than the entire amount of said bonds and Treasury notes, or of either of them, has been subscribed within said thirty days, he shall award the full amount subscribed to all persons who shall have made bona fide subscriptions for the sum of ——thousand dollars or less, at rates most advantageous to the United States, and the residue ratably among the subscribers in proportion to the amount by them respectively subscribed, at rates most advantageous to the United States.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I have but a word to say in regard to that amendment. I think we have made a mistake n relation to our debt in not having endeavored to popularize it more than we have done. I do not have much faith that we can do that with this loan as it now stands by the action of the Senate; but still I should like to give an opportunity to the people of the country generally to take these bonds if they feel inclined to do so. That is my purpose in introducing the amendment. It provides for an opportunity to be given all over the country, in every State and Territory where there is a national bank, for any man who desires to take these securities to subscribe for them, under such regulations in regard to the safety of the Government as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe. That is the sole and only purpose of it, and if I thought the bonds would be taken, I should feel much more anxious about it than I do now.

Mr. EATON. I should like to have the amendment offered by the other Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] reported now, as it is of the same character, so that the Senate may have both before them. Of course they cannot vote on both at once.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the other Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the end of section 4 it is proposed to insert:

SEC. —. That before awarding any portion of the loan in bonds authorized by this act, the Secretary of the Treasury is directed to issue proposals for the same in the United States, and shall give not less than thirty days' public notice in two or more of the public newspapers in the city of Washington, and in such other places of the United States as he may deem advisable, designating the amount of such loan, the place and the time up to which sealed proposals will be received for the same, the periods for the payment, and the amount of each installment in which it is to be paid, if paid in installments, and the penalty for the non-payment of any such installments, and when and where such proposals shall be opened in the presence of such persons as may choose to attend; and the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to accept, if in his judgment the same shall be advantageous to the Government, the most favorable proposals offered by responsible bidders: Provided, That no offer shall be accepted at less than par: And provided further, That if the whole amount of the loan in bonds herein authorized shall not be subscribed for in the manner provided in this section, then the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to dispose of said bonds, in his discretion, at not less than par, as prescribed by the first section of this act.

SEC. —. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall report to Congress, immediately after the commencement of the next session, the amount he has borrowed under the provisions of this act, of whom, and on what terms, with an abstract of all the proposals, designating those that have been accepted and those that have been rejected, and the amount of bonds or Treasury notes that have been issued for the same.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. KIRKWOOD.]

Mr. KIRKWOOD. We had better have the yeas and nays on it.

Several SENATORS. Oh, no; we are all for it!

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Very well.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LOGAN. I desired to offer an amendment in line 16 of section 1. I suggested to the Senate that I should offer at this time an amendment to strike out the provision for issuing $300,000,000 of Treasury notes and to strike out "4" and insert "7," in line 16, so as to provide for issuing $700,000,000 of bonds; but seeing the temper of the Senate, and being satisfied that they will not agree with me in that proposition, the bill having been so radically changed from what I supposed it would be, I shall not propose the amendment. I merely make this statement as a reason why I shall not propose the amendment after announcing that I should.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is on the table an amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. ALLISON.]

Mr. TELLER. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. ANTHONY. Let us fix a time for taking the vote.

Mr. TELLER. I am willing to withdraw the motion for that purpose.

Mr. BAYARD. I think we can get through with the bill to-night.

Mr. TELLER. I withdraw the motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next amendment is that offered by the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. ALLISON.]

Mr. EATON. We have adopted an amendment of a somewhat similar character, offered by the other Senator from Iowa, [Mr. KIRKWOOD,] and I move that this lie on the table for the present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be laid on the table for the present, if there be no objection. The next amendment is the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas, [Mr. COKE.]

Mr. HARRIS. There was evidently some misunderstanding when the last vote was taken on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. KIRKWOOD.] A number of Senators around me supposed it to be the amendment of the other Senater from Iowa, [Mr. ALLISON.]

Mr. KERNAN. I supposed so, and so voted.

Mr. HARRIS. A number of votes were cast under that impression. I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment last adopted was adopted, with a view to, at least, allowing Senators to determine whether they prefer that amendment to the one presented by the other Senator from Iowa, [Mr. ALLISON.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee moves to reconsider the vote by which the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KIRKWOOD] was adopted.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. KIRKWOOD.]

Mr. HARRIS. I move the amendment offered by the other Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] as a substitute for the amendment now before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will now report both amendments.

The Secretary read the amendment submitted by Mr. KIRKWOOD and then the amendment submitted by Mr. ALLISON.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. There is a blank in the amendment offered by me, which, I suppose, should be filled before the vote is taken. I move to fill it with the word "two;" so as to read "he shall award the full amount subscribed to all persons who shall have made bona fide subscriptions for the sum of $2,000 or less," &c.

I will again repeat, if the Senate have any desire to understand just what I wish to effect by this amendment, that it has been a matter of complaint throughout the country that heretofore in placing loans they have been placed in such a way that the great mass of our people who might have desired to subscribe for them had not the opportunity of doing so. That has been one subject-matter of complaint, and much prejudice has been created against the Government and against the holders of bonds by reason of the fact that the great mass of our people had not this opportunity. The amendment which I propose gives them that opportunity. It does more; it provides that when subscriptions shall have been made, if any shall be made, through the country, those who have subscribed small sums, if their subscriptions are as advantageous to the Government as other subscriptions, shall have the preference. The subscriptions to the amount of two thousand dollars and under, if as advantageous to the Government as subscriptions of millions, shall be preferred so far as they go; and after these small subscriptions have been cared for, then, and not until then, the large blocks of subscriptions, made as they have heretofore been made, shall be allowed to take up the balance.

Now, whether the proposition offered by my colleague—with whom I do not desire to come in competition in any way, and I regret the circumstance that we appear to be placed in competition in this matter—does afford to any of our people, if there shall be such, scattered all over our country as well as those in our great money centers, the same facilities as are afforded by the proposition submitted by me, I must express very grave doubt. He may be able to show that it does. If it does, I am content.

Mr. ALLISON. I only desire to say a word with reference to these two amendments. I think the amendment offered by my colleague is a right and proper amendment, but I think in practice it may not fully provide for what is intended. It is true it does provide that the designated depositaries of the United States may take these subscriptions, and the Secretary of the Treasury may also designate other persons to take subscriptions under this amendment.

Mr. COCKRELL. The depositaries of the United States and all national banks.

Mr. ALLISON. That provides 2,000 places, at least, where these bonds can be subscribed for. It seems to me, if we desire to make this a popular loan, the utmost publicity should be given as to the time and place where the subscriptions are to be made, and that is the chief feature in the amendment which I have proposed. I desire the Secretary of the Treasury shall be required to give public notice to all the people of the United States that this loan is to be had, and that then persons can by sealed proposals subscribe for the loan. I admit that when my amendment was prepared I anticipated that the rate of interest would be 3½ per cent. I do not think there is likely to be any severe competition for this loan above par when the rate is 3 per cent. Probably the feature of sealed proposals may not be as important now as it would have been in the case of a 3¼ per cent. loan. I still think that my amendment affords all the protection that the amendment of my colleague affords, and in addition it provides that the Secretary of the Treasury shall make report of everything he does under this loan, in order that it may be publicly known hereafter what he has done, and that Congress may have full and complete information with reference to the proposals received and the proposals rejected, so that there will be no opportunity for complaint afterward.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. That section can easily be added to the proposition submitted by myself.

Mr. ALLISON. Of course; it is a matter I care nothing about.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] to two objections that I have to his proposition, and I wish to know whether there is anything in them or not. I have tried to read and to understand the two propositions before the Senate; and if I understand them correctly I prefer the proposition of the junior Senator from Iowa, [Mr. KIRKWOOD.] I will state the objections I have to the amendment of the other Senator from Iowa, [Mr. ALLISON.]

In line 8 of that amendment provision is made for "designating the amount of such loan, the place and the time up to which sealed proposals will be received for the same." I do not understand that under this provision in reference to sealed proposals being received the Secretary of the Treasury is required to give his notice as to any number of places where the proposals may be received, but he may designate New York, Chicago, Cincinnati, and three or four cities, and there it may end. Therefore, one objection that I have is that it is in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury to name a few places where sealed proposals will be received.

Mr. KERNAN. Let me make one suggestion as to the places. If there are different places he will have to open the bids at different times at the different places.

Mr. LOGAN. The amendment reads:

> Designating the amount of such loan, the place and the time up to which sealed proposals may be received for the same.

There is but one place where they are received. Notice is given; you send your sealed proposals there, and they may be opened in the presence of such persons as desire to see them opened. That seems to me very loose; it seems to me that it does not afford to the people all over the country the opportunity that the amendment of the junior Senator from Iowa does.

Another objection I have to the amendment of the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] is that I object to sealed proposals. I do not see why there should be any secrecy about bids for these bonds. They are to be sold at par. Why then is there any secrecy? Why should I be required to seal up my proposal? Why should I not just say to the Secretary of the Treasury or whoever he may designate, "I will take $10,000 of these bonds," or whatever amount I might be able to take? I put my name down and subscribe for them. It is like all sealed proposals. I do not say that there would be any fraud or anything of that kind; I intimate no such thing; but I am for an open, square, daylight thing, that people all over the country may have an opportunity to subscribe for these bonds.

Mr. BAYARD. They will be opened after they are sealed.

Mr. LOGAN. Of course they will be opened afterward; but why should they be sealed at all?

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator from Illinois allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. HARRIS. If this amendment is adopted as a substitute, with the approbation of the Senator who is the author of the amendment I will move to strike out the word "sealed" from the amendment that is now offered as a substitute.

Mr. LOGAN. I am merely stating my objections to it, and I said when I got up that the Senator from Iowa might possibly obviate all serious objection that I might have to it if I may not understand it. But I have another objection to the amendment. It provides that—

The Secretary of the Treasury—

That is, after the sealed proposals are opened—

is authorized to accept, if in his judgment the same shall be advantageous to the Government, the most favorable proposals offered by responsible bidders.

Of course upon the face of that it is all right; but there is in my mind a very serious objection to it. To illustrate my objection, suppose there are two of us who are bankers. We bid for these bonds. I propose to take $100,000,000 of them at par. The other banker proposes to take all of them at par. That, then, is the most favorable proposal to the Government of the United States. It cuts me out of getting a cent of them. The Secretary of the Treasury has it in his power then to give all the bonds to one syndicate or one banker or one individual. I do not think that is right. If I can understand the English language, that is exactly what this proposition means.

Mr. PADDOCK. It is an invitation to form a corner.

Mr. LOGAN. It means exactly what the syndicate has meant heretofore, that they may gobble the whole thing, provided the Secretary of the Treasury thinks theirs is the most favorable proposition, and the Secretary of the Treasury would most naturally think it was a favorable proposition which proposed to take all the bonds in one bid. That, then, is just as it has been heretofore. Nobody else would have an opportunity to get them. Some great wealthy corporation could take the whole of them at par; and then in the next four weeks, with this section that you have in the bill, which forces the banker who has his 5 per cent. and his 6 per cent. bonds on deposit as security for a circulation, to come and purchase these new bonds, the Secretary of the Treasury may allow them all to go into the hands of a syndicate under this proposition, and then, under your law forcing the banker to take them, he will pay 5 per cent. premium on them. I do not say that it is intended for any such purpose, but that is exactly one effect the proposition may have. I mean by that that it can be so construed as to allow this thing to be done.

If I understand the intention of this refunding bill, it is that the people may have an opportunity to subscribe. You say you desire them to take these bonds. In fact, you put a provision on here that forces $210,000,000 of them to be taken. Adopt this amendment, and you force these bankers to go out of the banking business or force them to purchase their bonds from the party who may be the most favorable bidder for all of this loan.

These are the objections I have to this proposition. If it can be changed so as to avoid these objections, I have nothing to say about it; but I do think these are very serious objections.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I should like to ask my colleague whether I may misunderstand his proposition, but it seems to me the meaning of it would be that persons living in Iowa and Kansas or further west, if they have any money to spare and want to put it into bonds, would have to send bids here to the Treasury, and if they wanted to see that the thing was done fairly, they would have to have somebody here when the bids were opened to inspect them and to overlook them, and would have to send certificates that they were responsible persons to make good their bids. I may misunderstand the proposition of my colleague.

Mr. ALLISON. Of course, it is easy to criticise a proposition, and it is easy to imagine (I know my colleague does not intend to do so) that a Secretary of the Treasury will do this, that, or the other, with reference to such a thing. Of course, a Secretary of the Treasury might designate but very few places under this amendment of mine; and I will repeat what I said before, that my amendment had in view the fact that we should agree upon a 3½ per cent. bond, and that that bond would probably sell at a premium. It was with the intent to protect the Government of the United States in securing the best possible sale of these bonds that I offered this amendment, and at the same time to give entire publicity to everything that occurs in the placing of the loan, and also to give an opportunity to every section of the Union and every portion of it to subscribe for these bonds. I say with this bill, as it stands now, I think the amendment of my colleague carries out his view, and I am quite certain that we are not likely to get a premium upon these bonds. The Senator from Illinois, of course, finds objections, which may or may not have force.

It is true that the Secretary of the Treasury might in his discretion give the whole of this loan to a single syndicate, as the Senator says, but that certainly is not the aim and object of the amendment; and a Secretary of the Treasury who would be guilty of that would deserve little less than impeachment if he would undertake to so dispose of these loans. But inasmuch as it is a loan that will undoubtedly now be negotiated at par it matters very little whether these proposals are sealed proposals. It matters very little with reference to the machinery which I propose here, because I have not the slightest idea that anybody in Iowa or in Kansas or anywhere else will propose to give a very large premium for these bonds. I think the limit placed upon them by my colleague of $2,000 will amply protect all the people in Iowa who wish to subscribe. I think they will have a full and free opportunity to take all these bonds they may desire.

So far as the national banks are concerned, who are compelled under the compulsory processes of this bill to take these bonds, I am quite sure that they will be as agile and as active in making subscriptions as any other class of people. If they want to continue the business of banking under this bill as it stands, of course they will subscribe for the full amount of bonds that they propose to surrender, and in that way they would undoubtedly receive them.

I have no feeling about this matter, of course; I only offered my amendment with a view of thoroughly protecting the public in case we should issue a bond which might sell at a premium. If these bonds are to be sold at par I am as indifferent as any Senator can be whether the proposition of my colleague is supported, or whether my own proposition is supported. I did not even choose to offer my amendment as a substitute for his, because I regard it as wholly immaterial which is adopted.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to ask the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] a question, because what I said about the two amendments was for the purpose of trying to get at the facts and understand which would be the best for the country. Under the Senator's amendment as I read it, "the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to accept, if in his judgment the same shall be advantageous to the Government, the most favorable proposals offered by responsible bidders." Does not that authorize the Secretary to reject a responsible bidder? Is not that true?

Mr. ALLISON. The lowest bidder?

Mr. LOGAN. No, not at all; that is not it. I am trying to get at the meaning of the proposition. Suppose there are three of us bidding for these bonds. I bid for $25,000; the other two bid for $300,000,000, and mind we are all bidding at the same price. I am a responsible bidder, but the other two bids are the more advantageous to the Government because of the amount that they bid for. Now, under this proposition, has the Secretary of the Treasury the right to reject my bid and accept the other two?

Mr. ALLISON. I do not think he has.

Mr. LOGAN. I do; I think most certainly he has. I do not think there is a particle of doubt about it at all. He would so construe it, if in his judgment it was the more advantageous to the Government to accept the bid of the other two.

Mr. ALLISON. How can it be so?

Mr. LOGAN. It can be so. Let me illustrate again. You have $400,000,000 that you want to put on the market. I send in a sealed proposal for the whole $400,000,000. Another man sends in a sealed proposal for $100,000,000. Is not mine the most advantageous bid for the Government? Is not that true? It certainly is, for it takes them all in one bid at the same price, but it does not give the other man an opportunity, and you propose under this law that all shall have a fair chance to purchase these bonds. It being the most advantageous bid to the Government to take all of them together for the same price it gives me the bonds, if I should happen to be that person, which certainly I would not, no matter how small the amount, because the person who is enabled to take them all, or even three-fourths of them or two-thirds of them, has an opportunity to put them out the next day and force the bankers to purchase them at a heavy premium, or else go out of business. That is the effect of the amendment in my judgment. That being my judgment, I am opposed to this provision. Of course I may be mistaken, but that is the way I read it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] as a substitute to the amendment offered by his colleague.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I think we had better have the yeas and nays.

Mr. ALLISON. Let us see; perhaps we do not need them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. As many as favor the amendment offered as a substitute will make it known by saying "ay;" those opposed "no." [Putting the question.] The ayes appear to have it.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. GROOME. Before the yeas and nays are taken, I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] two questions about this amendment. The first is, referring him to the language in line 8, whether the amendment does not limit the Secretary of the Treasury to the designation of one place at which proposals can be made for these bonds? I think with deference that it does. The language of the amendment is that he shall issue proposals for the same in two papers in Washington and papers in other places, which proposals shall designate "the amount of such loan, the place, and the time up to which sealed proposals will be received for the same." It seems to me that that language plainly limits the Secretary of the Treasury to the designation of one place at which alone these sealed proposals can be made for this loan. That is one objection I have to the amendment.

The second question which I ask the Senator from Iowa relates to a proviso in the first section of his amendment, which declares:

That if the whole amount of the loan in bonds herein authorized shall not be subscribed for in the manner provided in this section, then the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to dispose of said bonds, in his discretion, at not less than par, as prescribed by the first section of this act.

Under that proviso, suppose that nineteen-twentieths of these bonds were subscribed for at par, or even at a higher rate, would not the Secretary of the Treasury, all of them not being so subscribed for, be authorized to dispose of them in his discretion under the first section of this act? It certainly seems to me that that is the meaning of that proviso, if it has any meaning at all.

Mr. EATON. "At not less than par."

Mr. GROOME. But that is not the point I am making. The proviso declares that in the event the whole amount of these bonds is not subscribed for, then the Secretary of the Treasury may dispose of them all at his discretion under the first section of the act, the result of which it seems to me would be that if nineteen-twentieths of them even were bid for by the poor men of this land from one end to the other it would be in the power of the Secretary of the Treasury to dispose of them all to a syndicate. It appears to me that the amendment is certainly open to that objection.

Mr. ALLISON. That is a very fair criticism. I admit it should be "the residue." The amendment was drawn, as Senators know, on my desk here. I see that instead of "said bonds" it should read "the residue of said bonds" shall be so disposed of. That is a very proper criticism.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays have been ordered on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. ALLISON,] which is offered as a substitute for the amendment of his colleague [Mr. KIRKWOOD] by the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. HARRIS.]

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ANTHONY, (when his name was called.) I am paired on this question with the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. JOHNSTON.]

Mr. FERRY, (when Mr. BALDWIN's named was called.) I wish to state that my colleague [Mr. BALDWIN] is paired with the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. SAULSBURY.]

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. LOGAN. I paired some time since with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE] on the propositions then before the Senate. This being a new proposition outside, I do not know how he would vote, and I refrain from voting.

Mr. ALLISON. It makes no difference; the Senator can vote on this question.

The result was announced—yeas 14, nays 28; as follows:

YEAS—14.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. KIRKWOOD.]

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. On page 4, section 5, line 1, I move to strike out the word "May" and insert "July."

With the machinery we have now agreed to in this bill it is evident to my mind at least, and I think it will be apparent to the minds of the Senate, that the national banks which are required to make this substitution will not be able to do so by the 1st day of May. This bill will not pass finally probably before the very last days of this session, as it will have to go to the House, and it may take some days before action is again had upon it there; so that it will be impossible to prepare these bonds and have them distributed as proposed and then redeposit them in the Treasury by the 1st of May. I suggest that the 1st day of July be inserted in lieu of the 1st day of May.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McDONALD. In section 1, I move to amend by striking out, after the word "at," in line 25, the word "the" and inserting "a;" and in line 26, after the word "rate," by striking out "of" and inserting "not exceeding;" so as to read "bearing interest at a rate not exceeding 3 per cent." It relates to the three-hundred-million-dollar loan. It is the committee amendment, as far as the motion to amend goes, striking out the same words that were proposed to be stricken out by the committee and inserting what the committee proposed to insert, as far as the amendment goes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That has been voted on once before in Committee of the Whole, and the Senator will have to propose it when the bill is in the Senate.

Mr. McDONALD. The whole phrase was voted on in Committee of the Whole.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The committee's amendments were voted on separately, as the Chair is informed. The present occupant was not in the chair at the time.

Mr. COCKRELL. The whole amendment was voted on together.

Mr. KERNAN. "Not exceeding" and "one-half" were voted on together.

Mr. McDONALD. I offer this amendment as embracing a part of that.

Mr. COCKRELL. It was first proposed to vote on the first part of the amendment, and then before the question was put the whole amendment was voted on, striking out and inserting, so as to read, "at a rate not exceeding 3½ per cent."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The fact is as stated by the Senator from Missouri, the Secretary informs the present occupant of the chair. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. McDONALD.]

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 18, noes 17; no quorum voting.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I call for the yeas and nays, and that will secure a quorum.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. McDONALD. The object of the amendment is to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to sell the Treasury notes at less than 3 per cent. if he finds that he can do so, but at a rate not exceeding 3 per cent. The bonds as the bill now stands are to be sold at 3 per cent. without any option on the part of the Secretary, but I think so far as the Treasury notes are concerned the discretion ought to be given the Secretary, so that if he can place them at less than 3 per cent. at par he should have authority to do so rather than fix a definite rate of interest in the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll on the amendment.

The Secretary called the roll.

Mr. LOGAN. I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. VANCE.] I presume if the Senator from North Carolina were here, he would vote for the amendment. I should vote against the amendment if he were here.

The result was announced—yeas 22, nays 17; as follows:

YEAS—22.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BAYARD. I wish to make a proposition to the Senate. It is that this bill shall be suffered to go into the Senate to-night from the Committee of the Whole, reserving separate votes for the amendments of the Committee on Finance as offered in Committee of the Whole, and that we shall by unanimous consent agree that the vote may be taken to-morrow at two o'clock. The Senate ought to be fuller than it is now when the final vote is taken. The last vote disclosed a bare quorum, and as I think there ought to be a full Senate upon the final vote on this bill, I ask unanimous consent to an understanding that to-morrow at two o'clock the vote be taken on the bill.

Mr. INGALLS. And meanwhile let the bill be printed.

Mr. MORRILL. With all the amendments?

Mr. INGALLS. Let the bill, with the amendments, be printed.

Mr. BAYARD. The bill, I think, had better be printed; that can be done to-night.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The order to print will be made. The bill is still in Committee of the Whole, and the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE] is the pending question.

Mr. TELLER. I want to inquire when the bill will be taken up to-morrow?

Mr. BAYARD. I would have it taken up immediately after the routine morning business.

Mr. TELLER. That will give us a little chance for an examination of it.

Mr. BLAIR. I wish to move an amendment to the fifth section.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is an amendment pending to the fourth section, submitted by the Senator from Texas, [Mr. COKE.]

Mr. BAYARD. Will the Chair state the proposition which I have made in regard to the vote being taken to-morrow on this bill and the amendments reserved for separate votes in the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Delaware suggests that to-morrow morning after the routine morning business is finished this bill shall be taken up and that the vote be had at two o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. BAYARD. Voting on the amendments separately.

Mr. TELLER. Reserving all of them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, that will be considered as the understanding of the Senate.

Mr. ALLISON. And the bill is to go out of the Committee of the Whole to-night.

Mr. BAYARD. I desire to reserve a separate vote on the amendments of the Finance Committee when the bill is reported to the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That will be the understanding.

Mr. COKE. I am entirely satisfied upon examination that the bill is not liable to the objection that my amendment sought to remedy, and I therefore withdraw it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas withdraws his amendment, and the Senator from New Hampshire can now offer his.

Mr. BLAIR. I should like the attention of the Senate a moment, although it is very late. I wish to move to amend in the fourth line, fifth section, after the word "circulation," by the insertion of the words "issued after that date;" so that the section will read:

From and after the 1st day of May, 1881, the 3 per cent. bonds authorized by the first section of this act shall be the only bonds receivable as security for national-bank circulation issued after that date.

I wish to say in support of the amendment a very few words. Of course, I shall not detain the Senate more than four or five minutes to-night, but I think it is worthy of the attention of the Senate that by the enactment of this law there are many of the national banks of this country that will be driven into liquidation.

Mr. VOORHEES. Will my friend from New Hampshire yield to a suggestion?

Mr. BLAIR. Yes, sir.

Mr. VOORHEES. The Senator from New Hampshire can offer his amendment to-morrow, and if he will yield to me for a motion to adjourn, I make that motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that under the suggestion of the Senator from Delaware the bill was to be reported to the Senate to-night.

Mr. HARRIS. Let the bill be reported to the Senate, and the Senator from New Hampshire can offer his amendment in the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair was about to state that the Senator from New Hampshire could move his amendment in the Senate.

Mr. BLAIR. I understand. I was merely going to suggest that the amendment I offered be printed with the other amendments, and I will move it in the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no other amendment to be offered in Committee of the Whole, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A separate vote is reserved in the Senate on the amendments of the Committee.

Mr. VOORHEES. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at eleven o'clock and twenty minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, February 17, 1881.

The House met at eleven o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of the legislative day of Tuesday was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Several members addressed the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is advised that in the order of recognition to make requests for unanimous consent the two next recognitions belong to gentlemen on the left of the Chair. The Chair will endeavor to pass from side to side in the interest of fair play to all.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. I desire to call up for present consideration a bill to change the name of a yacht. It is Senate bill No. 1837.

Mr. UPSON. I call for the regular order.

CONTESTED ELECTION, O'HARA VS. KITCHIN.

Mr. FIELD. I make a privileged report from the Committee on Elections in the contested-election case of O'Hara vs. Kitchin, second congressional district of North Carolina. I ask that the resolutions be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That James E. O'Hara is not entitled to a seat in this House as a Representative in the Forty-sixth Congress from the second congressional district of North Carolina.

Resolved, That William H. Kitchin is entitled to a seat in this House as a Representative in the Forty-sixth Congress from the second congressional district of North Carolina.

Mr. FIELD. I move that the report and resolutions be printed, and ask that the resolutions lie over for the present.

The SPEAKER. Is there a minority report?

Mr. FIELD. No, sir. It is a unanimous report.

The motion was agreed to.

CHARLES W. CARRIGAN.

Mr. FIELD. I also present a report from the Committee on Elections on the petition of Charles W. Carrigan, attorney for Thomas B. Florence. The report is adverse. I move that the report be printed, and that the petition be laid on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

CASE OF HALLET KILBOURN VS. JOHN G. THOMPSON AND OTHERS.

Mr. MARTIN, of Delaware. I make a privileged report from the Committee on Accounts, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay out of the contingent fund to FRANK H. HURD the sum of $3,300 in full payment of all costs, expenses, and fees to date as counsel in the case of Hallet Kilbourn vs. John G. Thompson, John M. Glover, JEPHTHA D. NEW, Burwell B. Lewis, and A. HERR SMITH.

Mr. MARTIN, of Delaware. Let the report be read.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Accounts, to whom was referred the bill of the House No. 7071, with report No. 153 from the Judiciary Committee, all in reference to the payment of FRANK H. HURD his fees, with costs and expenses, for services as counsel for the House of Representatives in the case of Hallet Kilbourn vs. John G. Thompson and others, having had the same under consideration, respectfully report:

That the services for which pay is sought were authorized by a resolution of the House; that they were faithfully rendered, and that the sum of $3,300 asked for in said bill and report is a reasonable allowance; that as this is a claim for services rendered to the House it is properly payable out of the contingent fund of the House.

Therefore, the committee report the accompanying resolution as a substitute for the bill, and unanimously recommend its passage.

Mr. MARTIN, of Delaware. I call the previous question on the resolution.

Mr. FORT. I would like to have this matter explained a little.

Mr. MARTIN, of Delaware. The report of the committee explains the resolution quite as fully as I can do. It is known to the House that there was an investigating committee appointed by the Forty-fifth Congress in regard to what was termed the real-estate pool in the District of Columbia. One Hallet Kilbourn was summoned before that committee as a witness, and declined to answer, whereupon the House directed that he should be confined for contempt of the House until he did answer. He remained in prison—I do not remember how long, thirty days or more—and I believe was then released upon a writ of habeas corpus. He brought action against the Sergeant-at-Arms of this House and the members of the committee charged with that investigation. That action was carried to the Supreme Court of the United States. The Sergeant-at-Arms, by authority of a resolution of the House, employed Mr. FRANK HURD, now a member of this House, to defend the officers of this House and the members of the committee who had exercised that jurisdiction. This resolution is to compensate Mr. HURD for his services in conducting this case before the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. REAGAN. I do not desire to say anything against this resolution, but I want to give my opinion of the matter by calling the attention of the House to the fact that on the question of contempt the House surrendered its jurisdiction of the matter to a petty court. The result was that the officers of the House and the members of its committee were brought into court to answer for a trespass, instead of the House compelling the offending witness guilty of contempt to answer to the exclusive jurisdiction of this House. It was the folly and fault of this House in failing to vindicate its jurisdiction which has brought the Government, as well as the officers and members of this House, into contempt.

Mr. CONGER. At the time these services were rendered was Mr. HURD a member of this House?

The SPEAKER. He was not a member of the House when the services were rendered, the Chair thinks. The gentleman from Delaware [Mr. MARTIN] having charge of this matter can state more distinctly.

Mr. MARTIN, of Delaware. If I am not mistaken the services were rendered during vacation.

Mr. ROBINSON. They were rendered during the Forty-fifth Congress, of which Congress Mr. HURD was not a member.

Mr. MARTIN, of Delaware. He was not a member of Congress at the time he was employed and rendered this service.

Mr. CONGER. I did not hear the report read, but it seems to me that a proper resolution would be one simply to pay the expenses incurred in this case by the officers of the House in defending or prosecuting, whatever it may have been, the suit in the United States courts.

By the decision of the Supreme Court the House unquestionably exceeded its power in the case of Mr. Kilbourn. That court has decided that the action of the House was a violation of the rights of the citizen. As the record will show, a great many members of this House thought so at the time, and voted against the proceedings.

Still I admit that the Sergeant-at-Arms and the other persons who were sued for carrying out what I then believed to be a high-handed trespass by this House upon the rights of an American citizen—I admit it is right enough that the officers of the House who carried out the will of the House in that respect should be protected from expense. But this bill or resolution singles out items, such as the fees of attorneys. In my judgment it ought to be a resolution that Congress should provide for the proper expenses of the officers of this House in defending this suit.

Mr. MARTIN, of Delaware. The Committee on Accounts, having audited this account, have adopted that form to cover all these expenses. If the gentleman from Michigan will listen to the reading of the resolution he will find that his idea is embodied in it, except that Mr. HURD is mentioned by name as the counsel in the case.

Mr. CONGER. Are there any other officers mentioned, or are there other expenses to be brought up hereafter?

Mr. MARTIN, of Delaware. No other expenses. I ask that the resolution be again read.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will again be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay out of the contingent fund of the House to FRANK H. HURD the sum of $3,300, in full payment of all costs, expenses, and fees to date as counsel in the case of Hallet Kilbourn vs. John G. Thompson, John M. Glover, JEPHTHA D. NEW, Burwell B. Lewis, and A. HERR SMITH.

Mr. CONGER. My point is simply this: the persons named here in the resolution, the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House and the members of the committee of the House, were prosecuted as individuals, not as the Sergeant-at-Arms, not as members of this House or of any committee of this House; they were prosecuted in their individual capacity. As individuals they sustained liabilities to pay costs and expenses for attorneys.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. Will this end this Hallet Kilbourn business, or is the suit still progressing?

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman will wait until I have concluded. I say that these gentlemen were prosecuted as individual citizens, not as officers of this House, not as members of this House, not as members of a committee of this House; not at all for their relation in any manner to the official positions they occupy. If they were put to expense in carrying out the will of the House, and their expenses should be paid, those expenses which they incurred by reason of carrying out the will of the House should be stated, should be examined, should be allowed, and they should pay their counsel, they should pay the costs, they should pay whatever expense may have been incurred. This resolution, so far as appears on its face, proposes to pay an attorney for appearing in the defense of individuals who happened to be in some way connected with this House. It shifts from the House the responsibility and liability which it ought to assume in connection with that defense.

Mr. MARTIN, of Delaware. Let me say to the gentleman that the House assumed the responsibility by passing a resolution authorizing the employment of counsel to defend this committee and these officers in the courts; and it was under the authority of that resolution of the House that this employment was made.

Mr. CONGER. Then that is the authority which warrants these individuals who were prosecuted in coming before the House and asking Congress to repay to them expenses which they incurred; but when such payment is made the account should be closed up. I want this resolution and the record to show that it was the House of Representatives that committed the trespass. I want the record to show that this high-handed attack upon the rights of a citizen, as the Supreme Court of the United States has declared it to be, was authorized and commanded by this House. Let us spread broadly upon the Journal and record of Congress the result of that attack upon a private citizen of the United States, as a warning to future Congresses not to exceed their privileges and their rights. That is my objection to this resolution.

Mr. MARTIN, of Delaware. I demand the previous question; but before it is ordered I yield three minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. ROBESON.]

Mr. ROBESON. Mr. Speaker, I understood that this matter is written on the record exactly in accordance with the facts—that these gentlemen, members of a committee and officers of this House, were sued for pursuing the directions of this House; that all these expenses have been incurred by resolution of the House; that the bill for these expenses has been presented to the Judiciary Committee and by them passed with a favorable recommendation and referred to the Committee on Accounts to be audited. If that is true, then the matter has passed through the different stages of investigation which this House can give it; and this House at every stage has assumed the responsibility.

I believe the original action of the House was wrong; but I think we ought not to punish our agents for doing what we directed them to do. The gentleman who is to be paid was a private citizen in the practice of his profession at the time when he was employed; and he is entitled in my opinion to more money than we give him for daring to maintain the principle the advocacy of which we imposed upon him.

Mr. MARTIN, of Delaware. I now ask a vote on ordering the previous question.

The previous question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was adopted.

Mr. MARTIN, of Delaware, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. COOK. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being demanded, the House resumes the consideration of the unfinished business which comes over from the legislative session of Tuesday under the operation of the previous question.

Mr. ROBESON. What is that unfinished business?

The SPEAKER. The bill known as the river and harbor appropriation bill.

Mr. ROBESON. How does it stand?

The SPEAKER. The question, as the Chair understands, is first upon the amendments.

Mr. ROBESON. I believe the previous question has been ordered.

The SPEAKER. It has been ordered on the engrossment and third reading of the bill, but not on its passage.

Mr. REAGAN. On the passage of the bill and amendments?

Several MEMBERS. Oh, no!

Mr. SPRINGER. The question of passage has not yet been before the House, and cannot be until the amendments have been voted on.

The SPEAKER. The rule regulates this matter.

Mr. BLACKBURN. The rule regulates it. The previous question has been ordered upon the bill and pending amendments.

The SPEAKER. It will exhaust itself on the engrossment and must be renewed on the passage of the bill.

Mr. ROBESON. Pending that question, I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary with instructions to report an amendment confining the expenditure of money therein appropriated to rivers, harbors, and streams within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the United States.

The SPEAKER. The Chair, under the rules, cannot entertain the motion at this stage, but will do so, as required by the rule, while the previous question is pending on the passage of the bill or after it has been ordered. Is a separate vote asked on any of the amendments?

Mr. COX. The yeas and nays, I presume, will not be taken by the rule until the question of final passage.

The SPEAKER. The yeas and nays are required by the rule to be taken on the passage of bills for the improvement of rivers and harbors.

Mr. REAGAN. There are no amendments increasing or decreasing the aggregate of the bill. Some of the amendments make a replacement of items, and some are verbal corrections. I hope we shall vote on the amendments in bulk.

The SPEAKER. No separate vote having been asked, the Chair will submit the question on the amendments in gross.

Mr. WARNER. Do I understand no amendments were made increasing amounts in the bill?

Mr. BLACKBURN. No, not one.

The amendments were agreed to in gross.

Mr. BLACKBURN moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendments were agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. REAGAN demanded the previous question on the passage of the bill.

Mr. ROBESON. Pending that I move to commit the bill to the Judiciary Committee with instructions to report an amendment confining the expenditure of the money herein appropriated to rivers, harbors, and streams within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the United States.

Mr. REAGAN. On that I demand the previous question.

Mr. ROBESON. Have I not the floor on that? I do not wish to occupy time, but I do wish to demand the previous question myself. I demand the previous question, and I also ask for the yeas and nays.

The main question was ordered.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 85, nays 152, not voting 54; as follows:

So the motion to recommit was disagreed to.

During the roll-call,

Mr. DUNNELL said: Mr. Speaker, two days ago I paired with the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. HILL,] expecting to leave the city, but as I have not been absent, and as the gentleman from Ohio has failed to vote, thinking the pair still continued, I ask by unanimous consent he be allowed to record his vote.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot ask for unanimous consent for that purpose.

Mr. DUNNELL. If the gentleman from Ohio is not allowed to vote, then I shall have to withdraw my own.

Mr. HILL. I do not wish to ask the gentleman from Minnesota to withdraw his vote. I only ask, if I am not allowed by unanimous consent to vote, that the pair shall be announced and the statement made that I would vote against the bill, while the gentleman from Minnesota would vote in favor of it. I do not suppose our votes would change the result or affect this motion to recommit with instructions.

The following pairs were announced from the Clerk's desk:

Mr. O'CONNOR, absent on account of sickness, with Mr. BREWER, for to-day.

Mr. HILL with Mr. DUNNELL. If Mr. DUNNELL were present, Mr. HILL would vote "no" on the bill.

Mr. KITCHIN with Mr. CABELL, on the river and harbor appropriation bill.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER with Mr. HASKELL, on this bill. Mr. SHALLENBERGER would vote against and Mr. HASKELL for the bill.

Mr. BAYNE with Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. BAYNE would vote for and Mr. MITCHELL against the bill.

Mr. VAN AERNAM with Mr. HENRY.

Mr. NICHOLLS with Mr. JOYCE.

Mr. JAMES with Mr. O'BRIEN.

Mr. HAMMOND, of New York, with Mr. EWING.

Mr. ROBESON with Mr. MCKENZIE.

Mr. HUTCHINS with Mr. MORTON.

Mr. MANNING with Mr. ARMFIELD.

Mr. TUCKER with Mr. FRYE.

Mr. LOUNSBERY with Mr. HAWKINS.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee, with Mr. STARIN.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. REAGAN moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. ATHERTON. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry, and it is this: Is it in order to move to recommit this bill to the Committee on Commerce with instructions?

The SPEAKER. It is not. The rules limit it to one motion to commit, with or without instructions.

Mr. ATHERTON. I know; but that is to the same committee.

The SPEAKER. At this stage only one motion to commit is in order.

Mr. ATHERTON. I know that is the rule.

Mr. BLAND. The previous question is called on the bill and amendments.

The SPEAKER. The bill is on its final passage; and pending that, either before or after ordering the main question, the rules recognize a single motion to commit, with or without instructions. That privilege, under the rules, having been exhausted, no other motion to commit at this stage is in order.

Mr. ATHERTON. Certainly not to the same committee.

The SPEAKER. To any committee, either standing or select.

Mr. ATHERTON. Suppose the proposition, however, is to commit to a different committee, as in this case to the Committee on Commerce——

The SPEAKER. The language of the rule is to commit with or without instructions, for which one motion only may be entertained pending the demand for the previous question.

Mr. ATHERTON. Then I lost my chance by waiting too long.

The SPEAKER. The motion could not now be entertained. The question is on ordering the main question.

Mr. CONGER. Before that is done I wish to ask consent to make a verbal correction in regard to an amendment which I submitted and which was adopted by the Committee of the Whole, in regard to operating these canals. I send to the desk the amendment, which is substantially the same, being simply transposod, and with the addition of the word "hereafter" at the beginning of it, so as to make the language of it perfectly clear. I hope there will be no objection to its adoption in place of the amendment adopted last night.

Mr. REAGAN. Let it be read; after which objections may be asked for.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out lines 625, 626, and 627, and insert "and hereafter, for the purpose of operating and keeping in repair the Des Moines Rapids Canal and Saint Mary's Falls Canal and the Louisville and Portland Canal, the Secretary of War is authorized to draw his requisition on the Secretary of the Treasury from time to time, which requisition shall be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated."

Mr. CONGER. It will be seen that the change is a mere transposition—the sense being the same.

Mr. HOOKER. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HOOKER. I wish to ask if that amendment is not the same proposition which was voted down in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not. This is a proposition, as the Chair understands, which was agreed to. Is there objection to the modification as proposed by the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection, and the amendment was modified accordingly.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the main question.

The main question was ordered.

Mr. REAGAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs on the passage of the bill, on which the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 162, nays 85, not voting 44; as follows:

So the bill was passed.

Mr. WELLBORN. My colleague [Mr. MILLS] requested me to state, in the event of this bill coming before the House for final action to-day, that he is absent from the city as a member of the committee appointed by the House to accompany the remains of the late Mr. FERNANDO WOOD to New York. I will also say, Mr. Speaker, that if my colleague were present he would vote for this bill.

On motion of Mr. RICHMOND, by unanimous consent the reading of the names was dispensed with.

The following additional pair was announced from the Clerk's desk:

Mr. MCKENZIE with Mr. CARLISLE, on this vote.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. REAGAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. COX. I ask for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the morning hour for the call of committees for reports.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move to dispense with the morning hour.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 94, noes 56.

Tellers were demanded.

The House ordered tellers; and Mr. REAGAN and Mr. SPRINGER were appointed.

The House again divided; and there were—ayes 108, noes 71.

So (two-thirds not voting in favor thereof) the morning hour was not dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour not having been dispensed with the Chair will now call the committees for reports.

REFUNDING CERTAIN DUTIES.

Mr. MORRISON, from the Committee on Ways and Means, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 6746) to refund certain duties paid upon military uniforms imported by and for the use of Company B, Sixth Regiment of Infantry, Illinois National Guard; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

BONDS BY CIGAR MANUFACTURERS.

Mr. PHELPS, from the Committee on Ways and Means, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 7141) to amend section 3387 of the Revised Statutes, relative to the bonds to be given by cigar manufacturers, with amendments; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the amendments and the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

LIGHT-HOUSE AND FOG-SIGNAL, POINT SAINT GEORGE.

On motion of Mr. BEALE, the Committee on Commerce was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 6735) appropriating money for the erection of a light-house and fog-signal at or near Point Saint George, California; and the same was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

PUBLIC LANDS AT FORTRESS MONROE FOR HOTEL PURPOSES.

Mr. JOHNSTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back favorably the bill (S. No. 1843) to authorize the Secretary of War to grant the use of certain land at Fortress Monroe, Virginia, for the erection of a hotel; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

THEODORE B. HARLAN.

Mr. BROWNE, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 6753) granting relief to Theodore B. Harlan, with amendments; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the amendments and accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ABANDONED MILITARY RESERVATIONS, ETC.

Mr. SPARKS, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back a letter from the Secretary of War relative to the disposition of abandoned military reservations and to land-titles division of the War Department, with accompanying papers, with a recommendation that the same be printed and laid on the table.

LIGHTING THE CAPITOL BUILDING, ETC., BY ELECTRIC LAMPS.

Mr. YOUNG, of Ohio. I am instructed by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to report back the bill (H. R. No. 7192) to authorize the lighting of the Capitol building, grounds, &c., by electric lamps, with the recommendation that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations. I ask that the report be read.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to which was referred the bill H. R. No. 7192, also the petition of the Northern Electric Light Company, respectfully report that the said bill and petition, with the accompanying documents, are herewith submitted to the House, and the said committee request it be relieved from the further consideration thereof, and that the same be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, to the end that it may investigate the proposition embraced therein, or any similar one, and provide for the necessary appropriation to carry the same into effect.

The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds were discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and the same was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

DAVID GOODRICH.

Mr. RAY, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 6164) granting a pension to David Goodrich; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

DANIEL CONNOLLY.

Mr. RAY also, from the same committee, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 4931) granting a pension to Daniel Connolly; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM M'GARRAHAN.

Mr. GUNTER. I am directed by the majority of the Committee on Private Land Claims to report back with amendments the bill (H. R. No. 6992) for the relief of William McGarrahan and to move that the bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar. I further ask that the minority of the committee have leave to present their views and that they be printed with the report of the majority.

There was no objection.

Mr. PACHECO. I present the views of the minority of the Committee on Private Land Claims on the bill just reported.

The bill and amendments were referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying reports of the majority and minority, ordered to be printed.

SHIP-RAILWAY ACROSS ISTHMUS OF TEHUANTEPEC.

Mr. OSCAR TURNER. I ask unanimous consent to present the views of the minority of the Interoceanic Canal Committee on the bill to construct a ship-railway across the Isthmus of Tehuantepec, known as the Eads bill, and ask that the same be printed.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. WARD, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. No. 1327) to grant lands to Dakota, Montana, Arizona, Idaho, and Wyoming, for university purposes.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Illinois, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (S. No. 1928) to provide for remitting the duties on the object of art awarded by the Berlin International Fishery Commission to Professor Spencer F. Baird.

VOTE ON RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

Mr. PACHECO. I ask unanimous consent to change my vote on the passage of the river and harbor bill from "no" to "ay." I voted under a misapprehension.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WILBER. I ask unanimous consent to have my vote on the same bill recorded in the negative.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot ask unanimous consent for that purpose when the gentleman did not vote on either roll-call; but the Chair can ask it when a gentleman desires to change his vote stating that he voted under a misapprehension.

HON. MORGAN RAWLS.

Mr. SAWYER, from the Committee on Elections, reported back, with an adverse recommendation, the memorial of Hon. Morgan Rawls; and the same was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

PAYMASTERS' CLERKS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, relative to paymasters' clerks; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

SOUTH FORK OF CUMBERLAND RIVER.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, relative to survey of South Fork of Cumberland River; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

IMPROVEMENT OF MISSOURI RIVER.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting report on surveys of the Missouri River; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, relative to improvement of navigation of Missouri River; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. FIELD, for the remainder of this week; and

To Mr. LAPHAM, for one week from Friday, on account of important business.

CONSULAR AND DIPLOMATIC APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. I rise to make a privileged report. I present a report of a committee of conference.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 6613) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic service of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by said amendment, insert the following: "chargé d'affaires and consul-general;" and the Senate agree to the same.

O. R. SINGLETON,
ERASTUS WELLS,
JAMES MONROE,
Managers on the part of the House.
WILLIAM W. EATON,
H. G. DAVIS,
WILLIAM WINDOM,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The effect of this report is to make the title of the representative of this Government at Bucharest, Roumania, "chargé d'affaires and consul-general."

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. This officer was confirmed as "chargé d'affaires and consul-general," and it is necessary to make this amendment to the bill.

Mr. DUNNELL. I understand no statement, such as is required by the rule, has been read. Does not the rule call for a statement signed by the conferees?

The SPEAKER. It will be again read.

The Clerk again read the statement appended to the report.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. What has been read was intended to be the statement called for by the rule.

Mr. DUNNELL. It is simply a note at the bottom of the conference report.

The SPEAKER. It complies with the terms of the rule, which does not require that it should be signed.

The report of the committee of conference was agreed to.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi, moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. BURCH, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon a bill of the following title:

A bill (H. R. No. 1381) authorizing the construction of a free bridge across the Potomac at or near Georgetown, in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. COX. I now call up the unfinished business.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. Would it be in order for me to appeal to my friend from New York [Mr. COX] to allow me an opportunity to ask unanimous consent of the House to pass a Senate bill granting a pension to a man who is now trembling upon the brink of the grave, and for whose relief a bill was passed by a previous Congress and lacked but a few minutes' time of reaching the President for signature?

Mr. WARNER. There are about 2,000 such cases as that. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the unfinished business, being the apportionment bill.

Mr. COVERT. The bill making appropriations for the support of the Agricultural Department is now in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ready for action by the House. While I recognize the importance of the bill in charge of my colleague, [Mr. COX,] I do not want to jeopardize the position of the agricultural appropriation bill. I would like to have my colleague indicate some time when his bill will be acted upon.

Mr. COX. I propose to call the previous question on the bill as soon as I possibly can.

Mr. CONGER. Are there appropriation bills now pending before the Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER. The sundry civil appropriation bill has been reported from the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed, but has not been returned from the Printing Office. The agricultural appropriation bill is in Committee of the Whole, but the gentleman from New York [Mr. COVERT] who has charge of that bill makes no motion in reference to it.

Mr. CONGER. The House ought to have an opportunity to determine whether or not it will go on with the appropriation bills.

The SPEAKER. Then some member of the House should make a motion to that end.

Mr. CONGER. I raise the question of consideration upon the apportionment bill in favor of the agricultural appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The question of consideration being raised by the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER,] the question is, Will the House now proceed with the consideration of the unfinished business, being the apportionment bill?

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 97, noes 79.

Before the result of the vote was announced,

Mr. CONGER said: I would like to have the yeas and nays on that question. I want to see whether we are to go on with the appropriation bills or not.

Mr. MORRISON. You need not worry yourself about that; we will take care of the appropriation bills.

Mr. COX. I have no objection to the yeas and nays.

The question was taken upon ordering the yeas and nays, and there were 43 in the affirmative.

So (the affirmative being more than one-fifth of the last vote) the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CONGER. I desire that the motion I made may be stated by the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] raises the question of consideration against the unfinished business, which is the apportionment bill.

Mr. CONGER. And in favor of the agricultural appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. And upon that question the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 143, nays 93, not voting 55; as follows:

YEAS—143.

Mr. KEIFER with Mr. MANNING, for the same time.

Mr. BAYNE with Mr. FROST, on all political questions until further notice.

Mr. MCLANE with Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio.

Mr. CABELL with Mr. BLAKE, on this bill.

Mr. PHISTER with Mr. CAMP.

Mr. ROBESON. As I am paired with the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MCKENZIE] on political questions, perhaps I ought not to have voted on this question. I withdraw my vote.

FREE BRIDGE OVER POTOMAC RIVER.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. I rise to submit a report from the committee of conference on House bill No. 1381.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 1381) to authorize the construction of a free bridge across the Potomac River at or near Georgetown, in the District of Columbia, having met, after a full and free conference, have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House of Representatives recede from its disagreement to Senate amendment No. 1, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to Senate amendment No. 2, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: Strike out all the words in section 2, and, in lieu thereof, insert the following:

"SEC. 2. That for the purpose of establishing a free bridge, and in lieu of erecting the bridge provided for in the preceding section, the Secretary of War may, in his discretion, purchase the aqueduct bridge now crossing the Potomac River at Georgetown: Provided, Said bridge, with all the appurtenances, rights, and franchises connected therewith, including piers and real estate for abutments and approaches, can be purchased for a sum not exceeding $85,000, which sum, or so much thereof as may be necessary, may be paid out of the money appropriated by this act: Provided further, That a good and sufficient title thereto can be secured to the United States to be approved by the Attorney-General of the United States: It is further provided, That the Alexandria Canal Company or its present lessees shall have the right to maintain, at their own cost and expense, a canal aqueduct of the same width and depth as the one now in use, and attach it to or suspend it from said bridge; and whenever a permanent bridge shall be erected upon said site, the same shall be of sufficient strength to sustain the weight of such canal aqueduct; but the construction, attachment, and maintenance of such aqueduct shall be such as the Secretary of War may determine, and shall be without cost or liability to the United States or the District of Columbia: And it is further provided, That if upon the erection of such permanent bridge the said canal company or their present lessees shall neglect or refuse to reconstruct, secure, and attach the said aqueduct at their own expense, or if at any time for the space of six months they shall fail to use such aqueduct for the purpose of a canal, or fail to keep the same in good condition and repair, or if at any time they shall use the same for other than canal purposes, then all rights of said canal company, its lessees or assigns, in said bridge and property shall cease and determine, and the said aqueduct shall be detached and removed by the Secretary of War."

And that the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to Senate amendment No. 3, and agree to the same, with an amendment, as follows: In line 2 of section 3, after the word "authorized," insert the words "in his discretion;" and that the Senate agree to the same.

NELSON W. ALDRICH,
EPPA HUNTON,
Managers on the part of the House.
R. E. WITHERS,
E. H. ROLLINS,
S. J. R. MCMILLAN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The statement accompanying this report as required by the rule, will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The effect of the foregoing action of the conference committee on this bill is as follows:

1. Amendment No. 1 of the Senate is verbal merely, and is agreed to.

2. In receding from disagreement to Senate amendment No. 2, and agreeing to the same with an amendment, the effect is to require the Secretary of War, in case he prefers to purchase the present aqueduct bridge, to obtain an absolute and perfect title to the piers and superstructure of said "aqueduct bridge" now crossing the Potomac River at Georgetown, with all the appurtenances, rights, and franchises connected therewith, at a cost not to exceed $85,000, allowing the Alexandria Canal Company to maintain a canal-aqueduct on the same as at present, but at no cost or expense now or hereafter to the United States. This sum is $15,000 less than provided for in Senate amendment No. 2, for which this is a substitute.

3. In receding from Senate amendment No. 3, and agreeing to the same with an amendment, the House simply allows the Secretary of War to repair the present superstructure at his discretion instead of compelling him to do so.

NELSON W. ALDRICH,
EPPA HUNTON,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] explain the provision about the rights of the canal company being divested at the end of six months? There was something of that kind read.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. If the canal company fails at any time for six months to maintain the aqueduct as a canal, or to keep the same in good repair, the rights of the company are to be determined.

Mr. ROBINSON. How have we the power to take away vested rights of the company, if there are any? That seems to be implied.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. In the first place, the company is to convey to the United States all its rights, vested or otherwise, in the bridge and canal.

Mr. ROBINSON. Is that provided?

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. It is.

Mr. ROBINSON. Probably I overlooked that provision. When a bill is read hastily in this way and read piecemeal, it is sometimes hard to understand its full effect.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. The whole can be read together.

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask that the bill be read as a whole. It is an important measure, not only because of the amount of money concerned, but also the rights involved.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. I think the rights of all the parties concerned are thoroughly guarded.

The SPEAKER. The whole bill will be read as it will stand if passed in the form agreed to by the conference committee.

The Clerk read the bill as proposed to be amended.

Mr. ROBINSON. I am content with that.

Mr. CONGER. There is in this bill a provision preventing the payment of any of the money appropriated until plans and specifications for a new bridge are made. There is another provision directing the Secretary of War to make survey and examination for the site of a new bridge, which must be somewhat expensive. The two provisions are inconsistent. The Secretary of War in one portion of the bill is directed to incur expenses which he is forbidden to incur at all in another part of the bill.

Mr. HUNTON. I think the gentleman is mistaken. All the surveys provided for in the bill will be made by the Engineer Corps of the Army, under the direction of the Secretary of War, and will not involve any expenditure of money.

Mr. SPARKS. On this side of the Hall we cannot hear at all what the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HUNTON] is saying.

Mr. HUNTON. I said that the gentleman from Michigan was mistaken in supposing that there is any conflict in the bill. The surveys directed to be made will be made by the Engineer Corps of the Army.

Mr. SPARKS. Does the bill so provide?

Mr. HUNTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. SPARKS. I wish to inquire wherein the bill as agreed upon by the conference committee differs from the bill as passed by the House?

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. It differs very materially. The bill as passed by the House provided simply for an expenditure of $140,000 for the erection of a new bridge. The bill as we propose to amend it gives the Secretary of War an alternative power to purchase the aqueduct bridge at a price not exceeding $85,000.

Mr. SPARKS. What was the amount stated in the original bill and what is the amount stated in the conference report?

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. Does the gentleman mean in the Senate amendment or in the conference report?

Mr. SPARKS. I mean in the conference report.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. Eighty-five thousand dollars. The amount named in the Senate amendment was $100,000 for a right to use the piers of that bridge. In the conference report we provide for an expenditure of $85,000 for an absolute title to all the franchises connected with the bridge.

Mr. SPARKS. The old bridge?

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. Yes, sir.

Mr. SPARKS. What was the amount named in the original House bill?

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. One hundred and forty thousand dollars.

Mr. SPARKS. Then the bill as now proposed to be passed would leave that amount appropriated for a new bridge, but with authority on the part of the Secretary of War to buy the old bridge for $85,000?

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. Yes, sir.

Mr. SPARKS. Those are the material points upon which I wanted information.

The report of the committee of conference was agreed to.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island, moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

APPORTIONMENT OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The result of the vote on proceeding to the consideration of the unfinished business was announced; and accordingly the House resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 7026) making an apportionment of Representatives in Congress among the several States under the tenth census.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FINLEY] is entitled to the floor—for one hour as the Chair understands.

Mr. CLYMER. Thirty minutes.

The SPEAKER. The present occupant of the chair was not in the chair when the House last had this bill under consideration. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLYMER] who then occupied the chair will resume it.

Mr. CLYMER took the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

Mr. FINLEY. I was about to say when interrupted that I am satisfied a majority of the House prefers to take a vote on this question of apportionment without further debate. I do not feel like discussing a question when such is the desire of the House; and now, Mr. Speaker, in order that the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] may demand the previous question on the passage of the bill and pending amendments, I will yield the floor to him.

Mr. COX. Let us have order, Mr. Speaker, while considering an important bill like this.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. CLYMER in the chair.) The House will come to order.

Mr. COX. I thank the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FINLEY] for giving up the hour to which he is entitled. I believe from the attention paid to this matter and from the publication of tabulated statements the House thoroughly understands it. I am requested on all sides to bring the matter to an issue. I therefore call the previous question on the passage of the bill and amendments.

Mr. CONGER. I do not know on what side the gentleman calls "all sides." I have been informed by several gentlemen on this side they were not prepared to vote on the question without having an opportunity for further discussion, and I believe that is the general wish of gentlemen on this side of the House that the discussion may continue for to-day.

Mr. ANDERSON. I ask the gentleman from New York whether it was not understood several gentlemen were to be permitted to address the committee? I think the Chair has got a long list.

Mr. CONGER. He has a list of twenty-five or thirty names.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Very nearly that number.

Mr. CONGER. Gentlemen who have signified to the Chair they wish to speak on the question.

Mr. ANDERSON. I hope the gentleman will not call the previous question to-day.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman insist on the demand for the previous question?

Mr. COX. I was in hopes of making some arrangement by which members could be accommodated. Gentlemen on the other side certainly do not want to vote to-day. Will they fix some time when they will take a vote on this question?

Mr. CONGER. I will say very frankly to the gentleman from New York that gentlemen on this side of the House have proposed to consult in regard to this matter, but as yet have had no opportunity to do so. We desire that opportunity before we are called upon to vote on the bill or amendments.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman indicate some time when the vote can be taken? Let the debate go on this afternoon and fix some time Friday or Saturday when a vote can be taken.

Mr. CONGER. Let debate go on this afternoon without calling a vote on the amendments or the bill, and that will be satisfactory, but I am not authorized to fix any time.

I state with frankness on this side we desire to have an opportunity to discuss among ourselves in regard to this bill, which opportunity we have not had and which we expected to have; but the House continued its session late into the evening.

Mr. COX. I understand my friend to say debate this afternoon will be satisfactory to him?

Mr. HAZELTON. No, he does not say that.

Mr. CONGER. I say proceeding with the debate will be satisfactory, but I am not authorized to say at what time we are prepared to come to a vote.

Mr. COX. We are nearing the end of the session.

Mr. CONGER. That is the reason why I desire to take up a bill and go on with it until we have an opportunity to consult.

Mr. COX. State Legislatures are in session—twenty-odd—asking that this measure be passed. Even Ohio with a republican Legislature is begging for it. They wish to fix their districts. I think we would be criminally responsible unless we do something promptly before we adjourn.

Mr. CONGER. I know the gentlemen in the Legislatures are anxious to have this bill reached, but I also know that several millions of the people of the United States are anxious to have the agricultural bill passed. If my motion had prevailed we could go on with the agricultural bill this afternoon, and to-morrow we would have been ready to go on with the other matter.

Mr. COX. The agricultural bill will not take an hour. No one objects to it.

Mr. CONGER. Let us have a vote on it now.

Mr. COX. I propose to go on with this bill. I have it up now after very much trouble. So far as I am concerned I will allow the debate to go on this afternoon.

Mr. CONGER. There is nothing to prevent the gentleman from going on. Let the debate go on this afternoon and then to-morrow we can talk about taking a vote.

Mr. COX. I give notice to the gentleman and his friends that on Friday or Saturday I will call the previous question. What time will suit them?

Mr. HAZELTON. You are beginning to talk all right.

Mr. CONGER. Yes, I think that is amiable.

Mr. COX. I will fix the time for voting at Friday at three o'clock.

Mr. HAZELTON. Friday is private-bill day and we do not like to interfere with that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York made a remark to which the attention of the gentleman from Michigan should be called.

Mr. CONGER. I should like to hear it.

Mr. COX. I understand gentlemen around me here to say that the republican party will have a caucus this evening to consult in reference to this matter. Now, I think they are entitled to some privilege on this bill in their consultation. Therefore I will not demand the previous question this afternoon, but I would like gentlemen to designate some time either Friday or Saturday when they will not interpose any dilatory motions or filibuster, but come directly to a vote upon the bill.

Mr. CONGER. Except for the offensive word which the gentleman has used, which republicans never allow themselves to indulge in, the word caucus, I would have no objection to the gentleman's statement. What I said was that we desire to consult about it. Now, if the gentleman from New York will allow the debate to go on this afternoon I shall ask at the proper time, as we are to have an evening session for the business of the District of Columbia, that perhaps a little earlier than the usual time I will move that the House take a recess to enable us to have the privilege of consulting and deliberating together on this question.

Mr. MORRISON. And holding a caucus.

Mr. COX. Cannot the gentleman fix some time now when they will come to a vote upon this bill?

Mr. CONGER. We cannot very well do that now for the reason that I have stated, that we desire to have a conference about it. After that, however, after we shall have determined what course of action we will pursue, I will say to the gentleman from New York we will notify him.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. That is right.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I shall therefore, in the absence of any direct statement from the gentleman upon the other side, fix the time at twelve o'clock on Saturday, when I give notice that I will call the previous question upon this bill and amendments. That, I imagine, will give gentlemen on the other side ample opportunity to reach a conclusion as to their wishes in reference to it.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, I was entirely satisfied to come to a vote directly on this bill and without further debate. I believe it is the wish of a majority of the House to do so; but at the same time our republican friends on the other side indicate an evident disposition to have further debate upon it. That being the case, I propose now to occupy a brief portion of the time of the House in discussing this bill and kindred questions which grow out of it.

The debate on this bill, Mr. Speaker, has furnished a wide field for the study of human nature. If any one will take the pains to go over the various speeches which have been made upon it they will discover, with one or two exceptions, that every gentleman who has discussed this measure has taken pains to assure the House and the country that all he wanted was a fair, just, and equitable apportionment bill, one in which he did not desire to gain any personal, partisan, or local advantage whatever. That has been the statement made on all sides during this discussion. But this fact will be discovered, if you follow that statement out, that before the member gets through with his remarks he will be advocating a number of members in this apportionment that will redound to his advantage either in a partisan sense or to his State.

Now, I propose to be just as candid as to the incentive which influences me in regard to this bill. I say that I want nothing but a fair, just, and honest apportionment. But, Mr. Speaker, I am also free to admit that if there is any advantage to arise from this bill I am partisan enough to want to have it for my own party. Whatever disclaimer gentlemen may make, it comes to this: that each gentleman is seeking to obtain an advantage either for his State or party. Now, let me give an instance. The gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. CALKINS,] in his speech the other day, called attention to the speech of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SHERWIN] who represents the minority of the committee. He said:

I will quote a sentence here from the very able speech of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SHERWIN,] which I assert has not been controverted by any gentleman who advocates a lower ratio as a basis of representation than that advocated by him. I say, therefore, the statement he made must be taken as confessed and true. What is that statement? I have it here, and I will read it in the presence of the House.

He then proceeds to read:

Upon the basis of 301 the certainly democratic States have a gain of six and the other States a gain of two. Upon a basis of 311 the democratic States have a net gain of twelve and the other States have a net gain of six. On a basis of 319—

And that is the one the gentleman advocated—the certainly democratic States have a net gain of thirteen and the other States have a net gain of thirteen.

And the gentleman from Indiana proceeds to say:

Now, if you will read that to any fair-minded man and ask him which of these ratios is right, he would not hesitate long to decide in favor of the basis of 319.

Now, Mr. Speaker, to any one who has not examined this question closely that proposition looks very fair and plausible, but it is seeming only. That gentleman advocates a basis of 319; and he knows as well as I know, and as well as every gentleman who advocates that number knows, that by the passage of a bill fixing that as the number the northern and republican States make a net gain of six members. Now, let us see if I am right. While it is true that on a basis of 319 the net losses and gains are equal as compared with the present number, yet as compared with 311 the Northern States gain six, and that gain is strictly a republican gain.

Let us see how it is. The population of the United States, excluding the Territories, is as follows: The North has a population of 30,865,390; the South has a population of 18,504,204. Now, if we disregard the fractions and give to each section the number it would be entitled to regardless of fractions the North would have about thirty-one Representatives to every eighteen that the South would get, making a fair division. And according to numbers the preponderance of the North over the South would be seventy-seven exactly. I have made a fair computation. The North, according to its population regardless of the fractions, is entitled to just seventy-seven more Representatives than the South. But take 319 as the number of Representatives and the North gets eighty-one of a preponderance. Take 319 as the number and it will give two hundred to the North and one hundred and nineteen to the South, which would be a preponderance of eighty-one, six more than the North would be actually entitled to.

Let us take it on another basis. I devote this time now to this phase of the question because some of our republican friends advocate this number 319. The minority of the committee has reported in favor of it. Every gentleman, I think, (I may be mistaken as to one,) on that side of the House has advocated 319 as the number, protesting all the time that they are in favor of a just and fair apportionment, and at the same time charging the democratic side of the House with seeking to gain an unfair apportionment in behalf of the South, yet advocating a number that gives an unfair advantage of six in favor of the Northern republican States. With 319 as the total number, the East would get ninety-five Representatives, while it would be entitled only to ninety-four and sixty-nine hundredths of a Representative; the South would get one hundred and eighteen, while it would be entitled to nearly one hundred and nineteen; the West would get ninety-seven, while it would be entitled to ninety-seven and thirty-two hundredths; and the Pacific slope would get nine, while it would be entitled to eight and thirty-eight hundredths. Hence the East would get an excess of thirty-one hundredths of a Representative, or 47,977 represented twice, and the Pacific slope an excess of sixty-two hundredths of a Representative, or 95,954 people represented twice, which is an excess taken off the South.

It gives a gain to Pennsylvania, Massachusetts, New York, and Ohio, all republican States, but gives a gain of but one Representative to a Southern democratic State, and that is the State of Kentucky.

The bill of the committee fixing the number of Representatives at 311, while it may be objectionable in some points, has this to be said for it: It leaves fewer unrepresented fractions than any other number, perhaps, that has been named or can be named. But it is evident to me, Mr. Speaker, from the disposition I see on the other side of the House, that a bill cannot be passed in this House that will give to the South either an advantage or a full equality. I do not believe a bill can pass this House that will give the democratic States a fair equality with the republican States. I am willing, as a fair compromise, however, in the event that the bill of the committee cannot and does not pass, to take 307 as the number; and I will say here that 307 makes the preponderance of the North over the South exactly 77.

If we should adopt 307 as the number of Representatives, we would apportion the Representatives among the States nearly according to numbers as shown by the late census returns. The Eastern States would gain an advantage over the West and South, but not so great as the number advocated by the minority, 319.

If 307 be the total number of Representatives, the East gets ninety-two, while entitled to 91.13; the South gets one hundred and fourteen, while entitled to 114.15; the West gets ninety-three, while entitled to 93.66, and the Pacific gets eight, while entitled to 8.06; thus the East has .87 of a Representative more than its share, equivalent to 139,907 people twice represented, of which the South sacrifices .15 of a Representative, equivalent to 24,122 people unrepresented; the West sacrifices .66 of a Representative, equivalent to 106,136 people unrepresented, and the Pacific sacrifices .06 of a Representative, equivalent to 9,649 people unrepresented.

Mr. Speaker, I was surprised to see—I will not say I was surprised, for I was not, but I was sorry to see that the discussion of this bill afforded another opportunity for our republican friends to continue the old worn-out crusade against the democratic party in the South. I had hoped, and I have heard other members of the committee express the hope, that this bill would be discussed on its merits alone, and that our republican friends for once would abstain from abusing, vilifying, and traducing the democratic party in the South. But the debate had scarcely begun before the flood-gates of abuse were opened and the old story of bulldozing, intimidation, and fraud was rehashed by our republican friends.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS] took occasion to object to the passage at this time of this or any other measure making an apportionment, and gave as a reason that the enumeration in South Carolina was excessive and fraudulent. He said he did not believe it had been fairly taken, and at great length undertook to show that in taking the enumeration in South Carolina there had been fraud committed.

I hold in my hand the report of Mr. Walker, Superintendent of the Census. I will print as a part of my remarks a portion of it, in which he calls the attention of the country to the fact that two of the enumerators out of three in South Carolina were republicans, of known standing as such, while the other was a democrat, a man of unimpeachable integrity. He sent experts, republican experts, to the State of South Carolina for the purpose of fully investigating the question of fraud, and he is fair enough now to say in this report that there was no fraud, that the census was honestly taken. Let me read a word or two of what he says on that subject. It is so clear that I am astonished that the gentleman from Indiana would attack that census after reading it. He says:

The extraordinary gains reported in certain of the counties of South Carolina, and in the State as a whole, over the census of 1870 demanded, therefore, a careful investigation. It was notorious that South Carolina had not profited materially during the ten years since 1870 by immigration, either from foreign countries or from other States of the Union. With so slight advantage from immigration, it was not possible that an old State could have gained in population in the interval since 1870 to the degree which is shown by the comparison of the two censuses. It follows, as a conclusion of the highest authority, either that the census of 1870 was grossly defective in regard to the whole of the State or some considerable parts thereof, or else that the census of 1880 was fraudulent. The census of 1870 might have been defective in a high degree without fraudulent intention, through the incompetence or negligence of the enumerators employed. But the census of 1880 could not have exaggerated the population of the State without absolute fraud, inasmuch as the census law requires the name of every person reported to be written at length on the schedules, with a score of particulars as regards age, sex, nativity, occupation, &c., so that any illegitimate addition whatever to the schedules must be of the nature of a conscious and purposed crime.

Mr. Walker detailed Mr. Henry Gannett as special agent to investigate the taking of the census, and the Attorney-General instructed the United States marshal of South Carolina to co-operate with Mr. Gannett in the work of investigation.

Speaking of the work accomplished by Mr. Gannett, Superintendent Walker says:

Mr. Gannett left Washington on the 7th of September, accompanied by Mr. R. M. Barnitz, one of the most capable clerks of this office, and returned to the city on the 21st of September. I inclose a copy of his report, showing his proceedings under this commission.

It appears that Mr. Gannett visited six counties of South Carolina, being counties which showed extraordinary gains since 1870, and in those counties visited in all eighteen enumeration districts. In each of these enumeration districts the list of inhabitants returned to this office were subjected to examination by United States officials or by citizens. In general, these citizens were introduced and vouched for by the United States marshal of the judicial district, or by the United States collector of internal revenue, as not only men of reputation, but, with two exceptions only, as also recognized members of the republican party. In each of the eighteen districts in succession the names of inhabitants were so far identified as to put it beyond a doubt, first, that the census of 1870 in each of these districts was grossly defective, and, secondly, that the census of 1880 was substantially well taken. In no instance did anything appear which bore the semblance of fraud in the returns made to this office by the enumerators of 1880. In some districts nearly every family was identified as resident in the township, notwithstanding the great extent of the South Carolina townships, some of which embrace one hundred and even two hundred square miles. In all cases the identification was carried far enough to put it beyond a doubt that the fault of the impossible gains reported over the census of 1870 lay with the preceding enumeration.

It appears to me that the report of Mr. Gannett satisfactorily settles the question as to the fairness of the tenth census in South Carolina. It must be remembered that no reason existed for suspecting that enumeration beyond the fact of the extraordinary gain over the reported population of 1870. The supervisors of South Carolina are men of unimpeached character. Two of them are republicans who were appointed upon the strong and urgent recommendation of United States officials resident within that State, and of other persons highly connected in the past with the republican party. Of one of them (Colonel Pride) Hon. D. H. Chamberlain, late governor of South Carolina, wrote:

"He is a man of great energy, thoroughly acquainted with all parts of the State, apt and experienced in business affairs, with habits of accuracy and method which are of great value. He is a sincere southern republican, a member of that party in adversity as well as in prosperity. He is a good citizen, a good republican, and a good business man."

The third supervisor, a moderate democrat, is a man of the highest social connections and standing; a man of culture and learning.

Now, whatever might have taken place in the South during the reconstruction period, whatever fraud or violence existed there at that time—and I am not prepared to say, because I do not know, whether there was fraud, violence, and intimidation, or not—whatever might have been the state of society in the South then, I am well satisfied from conversation with gentlemen on this side of the House, gentlemen whom I have every reason to believe would not vary from the truth in any particular, men of integrity and men of honor; from conversation with those gentlemen by whom I am surrounded, from newspaper reports, from interviews, and information from other sources, I am satisfied that there is no more fraud, intimidation, or violence on account of politics in the South than in the North at this time; that there is no more violence in the South at elections than there is in the North; that if there is intimidation, if there is violence at the polls, a great portion of that violence, as I am prepared to show, has been used by the colored people against their own race.

I have been in this House now nearly four years. In the four years I have been here I have observed that on all occasions, whenever the opportunity offered, either upon a private bill or upon a public bill, gentlemen on the other side of the House have never lost an occasion or opportunity to vilify, abuse, and traduce southern members and their constituents. I have listened to it here daily and hourly.

Yet during the whole of that period, these gentlemen of the South have sat here quietly and heard their people abused, heard their section of the country traduced, with scarcely a word of reply, when they knew it was false and was being done for partisan purposes, in order that the republicans might "fire the northern heart" and carry elections, well knowing as they did, and as I know, and as you gentlemen know, that an incautious expression, an incautious word used by one of them in reply to your continued abuse, would be published all over the North and used against them, against their section, and against their party, to increase sectional animosity against them, which your continued virulence has kept alive.

Gentlemen, you know as well as I do that you have resorted to abuse of the South as a means of carrying the elections in the North. You know as well as I do that these gentlemen with whom you associate daily are not men of the character you would have the people of the North believe them to be. I believe it is due to these gentlemen to say this. I have associated with them; I have found them gentlemen of culture, gentlemen of intelligence; and I believe what they tell me when they say that this continued statement of fraud and violence in their localities is false in every particular.

But I am not compelled to take their word alone. I will refer to evidence which I have here. A few days ago we had up for consideration the contested-election case of Bisbee against Hull. A democratic House unseated Mr. Hull and seated Mr. BISBEE. There was no debate on the question. My colleague from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] called the previous question, and Mr. BISBEE was seated without debate.

Yet my colleague must have known what the testimony in that case discloses. I have taken some pains to investigate it, and I find that the election turned upon the vote of the county of Madison, in Florida. If the vote of Madison County was not counted, then Mr. Hull was entitled to his seat; if it was counted, then Mr. BISBEE was elected to the seat. The whole matter hinged upon the counting or not counting of the vote of that county.

I therefore have examined the testimony in reference to the election in Madison County. I am not now going to speak of the merits of that election case, because it has gone by. I am referring now to what I found in the testimony, because it bears upon the subject I have been discussing, to wit: Is there violence at elections in the South, and if so, by whom?

Upon investigation I found this state of affairs in Madison County: The canvassing board of that county failed to make a return of the vote of the county; and they stated as a reason for failing to make a return that the vote of one precinct had not been returned and the other precinct returns in that county were so "false and fraudulent and uncertain that they could not arrive at a true conclusion;" in short, could not tell how the vote had been cast. And the State canvassing board threw out that county, or rather did not canvass it.

I investigated the testimony in regard to that county in order to ascertain for myself whether the vote of the county should have been canvassed or not. By the way, I will say that the population of that county is largely composed of colored people. I found that in some of the precincts the colored people took possession of the polls. They formed long lines at the polls and forced their own color to vote the republican ticket. They took the tickets out of the hands of the colored people when some of them endeavored to vote the democratic ticket. In some instances colored men who wore the badge of United States marshals placed themselves at the polls and would not permit the colored voters to vote the democratic ticket.

Mr. KEIFER. If my colleague will allow me to interrupt him——

Mr. FINLEY. For a question, certainly; not for a speech.

Mr. KEIFER. This is hardly the occasion to reargue a contested-election case. But I would like to know of the gentleman where he finds anything to support any statement which he has made on that subject.

Mr. FINLEY. The gentleman will find out in a very few minutes.

Mr. KEIFER. Very well; but let me suggest——

Mr. FINLEY. I do not yield for a speech.

Mr. KEIFER. The gentleman will allow me to state that there was a single case where it was proved that a woman threatened her husband that she would not have anything further to do with him in a marital way if he voted the democratic ticket. [Laughter.] That is all there was of it.

Mr. FINLEY. I will say, Mr. Speaker, that that is the worst case of bulldozing I ever heard of. But I want to say to my colleague that I am not discussing that contested-election case except for the purpose of showing that all the intimidation, fraud, and violence used was by the colored people against their own race to prevent them from voting the democratic ticket. I furthermore found one case of a colored preacher who wanted to vote the democratic ticket, but was threatened with expulsion from the church if he did so.

Now, the gentleman asks me where I get my information. I will tell him. I send to the Clerk's desk to be read the deposition of Philip Jones, a colored man. Let gentlemen hear what he says. If my colleague wants to know where I get this evidence, I tell him it is a part of the testimony taken in the Bisbee case. The gentleman must have read it; yet I take notice that while he has frequently called attention to fraud and intimidation in the South, he was very quiet about fraud and intimidation in that case.

The Clerk read as follows:

Deposition of Philip Jones.

Philip Jones, being sworn, testified in substance as follows, to wit:

Q. Did you vote at Arredonda, Alachua County, Florida, at an election held at said place on the 5th day of November last, for member of the Forty-sixth Congress?

A. No.

Q. Where do you live?

A. At Arredonda.

Q. Did you register as a voter?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Why did you not vote?

A. Because I could not vote as I wanted to, and didn't vote at all.

Q. How did you want to vote?

A. I wanted to vote the democratic ticket, for Mr. Hull.

Q. What prevented you from voting for Mr. Hull?

A. Our own party of our color would whip us out if we voted the democratic ticket, and give us the devil.

Q. Were or were you not afraid to vote the democratic ticket on account of these threats from your race?

(This question objected to by contestant because it seeks to elicit illegal testimony.)

A. I was afraid to vote on account of those threats.

Q. You are a colored man, are you?

A. Yes.

Q. Do you know of others in the same fix you were, who wanted to vote the democratic ticket and were afraid to do so?

A. None that I know of except Edwin Perry.

Q. Were these threats made generally to your race?

A. They were made generally that they would whip any of them who voted the democratic ticket; they were made long before the election, and up to the election, that they would give them the devil if they voted the democratic ticket.

Mr. FINLEY. I now send to the desk the deposition of J. G. Johnson, another colored light in that county.

The Clerk read as follows:

Deposition of J. G. Johnson.

J. G. Johnson, being duly sworn, testified as follows, to wit:

Q. What is your name, age, occupation, and place of residence?

A. J. G. Johnson; age, 33; occupation, farmer; residence, Madison County.

Q. Did you vote at the election held on the 5th day of November, 1878, wherein Noble A. Hull and Horatio Bisbee, jr., were candidates from the second congressional district for Congress?

A. I did not.

Q. Are you a colored man or a white man?

A. Colored man.

Q. Are you a democrat or republican?

A. A democrat.

Q. Were there any threats or intimidation prior to that election? and if so, state how and in what manner, and where.

(Question objected to, on the ground that the allegations in contestee's answer are not sufficiently definite to apprise the contestant when and where the matters inquired of took place, if they did take place, and as seeking immaterial testimony.)

A. There was no intimidation used toward me prior to the election, because my political sentiments were not then known, but during the election, when I manifested my intentions to vote the democratic ticket at that election, there was intimidation, and ostracism, and stigmatism used toward me; it was not by one but by several, it was general; at the time of the election I was a school-teacher; my school numbered prior to the election and prior to the knowing of my political opinions, fifty-four scholars; but shortly after the election, when it was known that I intended and attempted to vote the democratic ticket, the number was reduced to six. It was generally talked among the patrons that they would not send their children to a democratic negro; I was also proscribed and intimidated, socially and religiously, for my former privileges in the church had been abridged and were allowed no more.

(Answer objected to as not pertinent to the question, and as immaterial and irrelevant.)

Q. By whom was all this done?

A. It was by the colored radicals.

Q. Did you or not receive a message, or was it or not communicated to you in some way, that a mob of colored women were coming over to whip you?

(Question objected to for all the reasons stated in the foregoing to the questions asked this witness.)

A. It was communicated to me while I was teaching school, that as they had failed to keep me from teaching that school by not sending their children, they intended to raise a mob and whip me away.

Q. Why were you treated this way?

(Same as to the foregoing.)

A. Because I am a democrat.

Mr. FINLEY. I send to the Clerk's desk to be read the depositions of F. P. Patterson, D. H. Blythewood, Thomas J. Blalock, all of the same county of Madison, all showing intimidation and violence on the part of the colored people of that section against their own race to prevent them from voting the democratic ticket. If the same intimidation and violence had been used by the whites toward the colored voters to prevent them voting the republican ticket, it would have been blazed over the country as a great southern outrage, but as it is only a little bulldozing on the other side no notice whatever is taken of it. Even my colleague, [Mr. KEIFER,] who had charge of Mr. BISBEE's case, and who must have read all this testimony, did not consider this colored republican bulldozing of sufficient importance to call for remark from him.

The Clerk read as follows:

Deposition of F. P. Patterson.

F. P. Patterson, being duly sworn, testified as follows, to wit:
Q. What is your name, age, and occupation?
A. My name is Franklin P. Patterson; am twenty-five years old; am a lawyer.
Q. How long have you been living in Madison County?
A. Ever since 1857.
Q. Where were you on the 5th day of November, 1878?
A. In the town of Madison, at the polls.
Q. Did you vote in Madison, at Madison precinct, that day?
A. Yes.
Q. Did you or not see any deputy United States marshals at the polls that day?
A. I did.
Q. Were they white or colored men?
A. They were all colored that I saw.
Q. Were they democrats or republicans?
A. They were republicans, or reputed to be such, and they distributed republican tickets.
Q. Did you or not see any electioneering done by those deputy United States marshals on that day?
(Question objected to as immaterial, as having no legal bearing upon the material issues in this contest.)
A. Yes; they were distributing tickets and bringing voters up to the polls.
Q. What tickets were they distributing and in behalf of what party?
(Objected to by contestant's counsel. Same objection as above.)
A. They were distributing republican tickets.
Q. In your opinion were their acts calculated to conserve the peace and insure fairness and impartiality at the election?
(Question objected to as immaterial, and because the opinion and impressions of the witness are not legal evidence.)
A. I think the election would have been quieter and a larger vote polled if they had been absent. I think all the people would have had plenty of time to vote if they had not been disturbed.
Q. Did you see or know of any colored man or woman attempting to hinder any colored man from voting the democratic ticket on that day, by threats, persuasion, or any other species of intimidation?
(Question objected to on the grounds that contestant has not been apprised of this line of testimony by contestee's answer, and is immaterial and is irrelevant, and further, on the ground that persuasion is not a species of intimidation.)
A. Yes; I saw one woman follow a man she claimed as her husband to the polls, and tell him if he voted the democratic ticket she would quit him. The women were very bitter and abusive in their language toward any colored man who would vote the democratic ticket; there were numbers of women on the ground.

Deposition of D. H. Bythewood.

D. H. Bythewood, a witness on behalf of the contestee, being duly sworn, testified as follows, to wit:
Q. What is your name, age, occupation, and place of residence?
A. My name is D. H. Bythewood; age, 25; merchant; Greenville, Florida; Madison County is my place of residence.
Q. How long have you lived in Madison County?
A. Seven years, about.
Q. Did you or not vote at the election held on the 5th day of November, 1878, in the county of Madison, wherein Horatio Bisbee, jr., and Noble A. Hull were candidates for Congress from the second congressional district of Florida? If so, state at what precinct.
A. I did; at Greenville precinct, district No. 5.
Q. Were you there in any official capacity; if so, what?
A. I was; as inspector.
Q. Did you see any deputy United States marshals there that day, or persons purporting to be such? If so, state how many.
(Question objected to as immaterial to the issues in this contest.)
A. I saw four persons—colored men—who claimed to be deputy United States marshals. They had on badges and were acting as such. Their names are Levin Bradley, James Thompson, and Benjamin McKee. The other party—I do not know his name.
Q. Did or not either of these deputy United States marshals bear any arms?
(Question objected to as immaterial to the issues, and because the allegations in contestee's answer are not sufficiently definite to apprise the contestant of the time and place the acts inquired of occurred, if they did occur.)
A. One of them did; Benjamin McKee had a pistol under his arm.
Q. Did or did not these deputy United States marshals distribute tickets on that day; if so, what kind?
(Same objection as to the foregoing question.)
A. One of them did. I think it was Levin Bradley. I do not know what kind.
Q. Were the acts of these United States deputy marshals such as to insure a fair and peaceable election?
(Question objected to for the reasons stated in the foregoing objections, and because the opinions and impressions of the witness are not admissible, and he must be confined to the particular acts, if any, done there.)
A. I saw Levin Bradley several times at the window advising colored men who were challenged whether to take the oath or not. One man by the name of Burkes, who applied to vote and was challenged, he took by the shoulder and told him he had better not vote.
Q. Were there or not persons who voted there that day whose names were not on the registration list? If so, how many?
(Objected to as immaterial and as not the best evidence attainable.)
A. There was about twelve, I think; nine colored men and three white men. I objected, as one of the inspectors, to allow them to vote, but was overruled by the other two.
Q. When the election was over did you make out certificates in accordance with law and transmit to the proper officers?
A. I do not know whether they were made in accordance with law or not, as I had had no experience in such matters.
Q. Were the certificates signed and sealed up and sent to the clerk and county judge?
A. They were signed and put in the ballot-box and given to D. J. Straughter; that is, ballot-box and key. D. J. Straughter was the republican inspector.

Deposition of T. J. Blalock, Cherry Lake.

Thomas J. Blalock, being duly sworn, testified as follows, to-wit:
Q. What is your name, age, occupation, and place of residence?
A. Thomas J. Blalock; forty years of age; am a planter; residence, Cherry Lake precinct, Madison County.
Q. Did you vote at the election held the 5th day of November, 1878, in Madison County, wherein Noble A. Hull and Horatio Bisbee, jr., were candidates for Congress from the second congressional district; and if so, at what precinct?
A. I did; in the seventh district of Madison County, Cherry Lake.
Q. Do you know of any one voting at that precinct who was disqualified?
A. I do not.
Q. Did you see any votes taken from the hands of colored people?
(Question objected to as immaterial unless it be shown that the votes were taken from their hands by force or without their consent, and because the question seeks to elicit testimony about matters of which the contestant has not been adequately apprised by contestee's answer.)
A. I did.
Q. Was any species of force or compulsion used. If so, in what manner?
A. I can't say they were taken by force, but without their consent; the tickets were taken and torn up and others were placed in their hands.
Q. By whom was this done?
A. As well as I can recollect it was done by those that managed around the polls, said to be marshals; they wore a badge.
Q. White people or colored?
A. Colored.
Q. What ballots were taken from them?
(Question objected to, on the ground that the persons from whom ballots were taken, if any, would be the best witnesses as to the facts inquired of, and as to all facts connected therewith.)
A. Democratic tickets, or ballots.
Q. State how you know they were such.
A. I gave them to them myself, and saw them start to the polls.
Q. Were the parties who took these tickets from them democrats or republicans?
A. Republicans.
Q. Did they act in any official capacity there that day?
A. They claimed to be doing so. They were acting, as they said, United States marshals in and around the polls.
Q. Were all their actions calculated to give a fair and impartial election, or not?
(Question objected to as leading and seeking the opinion and impressions of the witness.)
A. I think their actions had a tendency to intimidate voters, and to keep them from voting as they would have done.
Q. Did or did not these United States marshals electioneer for the republican ticket that day?
(Question objected to as immaterial.)
A. They did.
Q. Did or not they place themselves in such a position as to see the colored men as they voted, and see what ballots they voted?
(Question objected to as leading and immaterial.)
A. I think they did; they were in and around the polls or near the polls the whole time.
Q. Are you familiar with the voters of that precinct; and, if so, do you think Noble A. Hull lost any votes by the action of these United States marshals; and, if so, how many?
(Question objected to on the ground that contestee has laid no legal basis by which to make the opinion of the witness relevant or admissible.)
A. I think I know all the voters in the precinct, and I think the actions of those marshals changed the course of the election in that precinct considerably in regard to Mr. Hull; to what extent I could not say positively; there were several voters that came to me after voting and told me that they would have voted differently but for fear of those around.
Q. Was or not the interference and intimidation by these deputy United States marshals sufficient to render it an unfair and partial election at that precinct?
(Question objected to as impertinent and irrelevant.)
A. I think it was.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, I now send to the Clerk's desk to be read the testimony of three other witnesses in Duval County in that State, showing that violence and intimidation at the late election was not confined to Madison County alone; and I will say here that these extracts of testimony are selected from a large mass of the same character, all tending to prove the position I have taken, that, especially in the regions of the South where the colored population predominates, violence and intimidation is principally confined to force used by colored people to prevent their own color from voting any other than the republican ticket. Yet this state of facts is not generally known in the North; newspapers make no note of it; republican orators sing dumb on the subject, and the gentlemen on this side of the House have heretofore seen fit to maintain silence.

The Clerk read as follows:

Deposition of J. L. Burch.

J. L. Burch, being sworn, deposes as follows:
Q. What is your name, age, occupation, and residence?
A. Joshua Loyd Burch; forty-two; brickmaker; La Villa, Duval County, Florida.
Q. Were you present at an election held on the 5th day of November, 1878, at La Villa, precinct No. ——, at which election Horatio Bisbee, jr., and Noble A. Hull were candidates for Congress? If there, did you hold any official position, or were you present during the entire day? If so, state anything you saw that tended to interfere with the free exercise of ballot on the part of anybody there that day, in your own language without further question.
A. I was at the polls mentioned from the opening until about five in the evening, as a private citizen, thinking that it was in the interest of the democratic party that I should remain there, there being no other white person outside the polls. Before the voting began I was under the impression that I was a candidate for the State Legislature. At the time the polls were opened, there were, probably, about one hundred and fifty people present. The voters formed themselves in line when the voting began. A number of persons, colored men, some of them wearing deputy United States marshals' badges, were busy along the line inspecting tickets in the hands of colored men. I saw them take tickets from the hands of colored men in this line forming to vote, tear them up or throw them away. I remonstrated against such action, and later in the day there was not so much of it done. After the crowd had voted, and only an occasional voter would put in an appearance, the colored men, seeing a voter approaching, would go several blocks to meet him, offering him a ticket, and demanding to see the ticket he had with him, if any. Even the colored ladies joined in these interviews, in a few instances. I heard a great many expressions that would tend to keep a colored man from voting the democratic ticket if he preferred. I saw no criminal act, with one exception, such as I considered a criminal act. Such expressions as he had been bought by the democrats, and they would jeer him when a colored man would say anything favorable to the democrats. The tickets that I saw torn and scattered were printed in the same type as the republican tickets, and the parties seemed to be looking for the tickets with the names of John Mateal, Sawyer, &c., because the democratic ticket was printed in a different type, and could be told twenty feet off. When a party seemed reluctant to show his ticket they would surround him, and jeer him, and urge him to show his ticket. I received some fifteen or twenty votes in this precinct more than the regular democratic ticket. I was sent for several times, and met men who were disposed to vote a split ticket. I pasted my own and other names over the names on the regular republican ticket. I always found these men in back rooms or by-places from the polls. Several of these men, whose tickets I had fixed for them, asked me not to mention the fact I had fixed their tickets, because, they said, they had families, and lived in the community, and it would be unpleasant for them to live there if it was known they had voted the democratic ticket.

Q. Did you see any attempt on the part of the colored voters who voted with the republican party to jeer, insult, or hoot at others who went to the polls to vote that day? If so, state it.

(Question objected to as immaterial and irrelevant.)

A. Two white men named Mulally, who I believe to be in the employ of L. A. Hardee, came with him to the polls. Hardee took democratic tickets from me, and placed them in their hands. When they approached the polls to vote, the colored men about them began calling them names, offering them republican tickets, pressing upon them, and jostling them, when I interfered and they were allowed to vote peaceably. I noticed tears in the eyes of one of them.

Q. From what you saw, do you consider the result of the election at La Villa precinct was such as to enable one to determine what would have been a fair and honest expression of the ballot had there been no interference or undue influence exercised by the deputy United States marshals and the mass of republican voters round the polls?

(Question objected to upon the ground that the answer presupposes an opinion or a conclusion of law. Second. That there is no evidence yet that the United States deputy marshals did interfere; there is no evidence that there were any United States deputy marshals there.)

A. Having been an interested party in the result of the election, I may not be competent to give a fair opinion, but in my opinion a colored man was not at liberty to choose his ballot that day, unless his political convictions favored the republican party.

Deposition of Jesse H. Oxendyne.

Jesse H. Oxendyne, being recalled as a witness and being duly sworn, deposes as follows:

Q. What is your name, age, residence, and occupation?

A. Jesse H. Oxendyne; about thirty-four; Jacksonville, Duval County, Florida; carpenter.

Q. Where were you on the 5th day of November last?

A. At the Moncrief voting precinct, district No. 8, Duval County, Florida.

Q. Did you see any United States deputy marshals there that day?

A. I seen a great many men wearing badges, deputy marshals, sheriffs, and constables.

Q. Did you notice any violence or any interference with the freedom of the right of suffrage?

(Objected to, as the object of the question is to prove intimidation of voters whereby they were prevented from voting. The proper evidence of that fact is the testimony of the voter intimidated; further, contestant objects to the witness giving his opinion. He can only state facts.)

A. I noticed when any colored man came up there to vote any other ticket than the republican, the ticket was taken out of their hands. The colored people are very excitable in a case like that in an election. I will further state that the tickets taken from their hands, so far as I could see, was the fusion republican ticket, with the name of John Mateal and others for the State Legislature. I will say that every colored voter that came forward numbers would require them to show their ticket; if they did not, they got angry.

Q. Are you a white or a colored man?

A. A colored man mixed with Indian.

Q. Are you acquainted with the character and habits and disposition of the great masses of the colored people in regard to politics?

A. I think I am.

(Question objected to as immaterial and irrelevant.)

Q. From such acquaintance and from your intercourse with your race, please state whether or not considerable numbers of the colored people are inclined to and have evinced a disposition to vote the democratic ticket, either in part or in full, if they had no cause of fear for any reason from their own race.

(Objected to as immaterial and irrelevant. It seeks to elicit the opinion of the witness upon a subject concerning which he is not shown to be competent to testify. It is not important how men would have voted in a certain contingency not shown to exist and which every intelligent man in Duval County knows does not exist. The question is, how did the electors vote at the last election?

Contestant objects to such evidence going on the record.)

A. Yes, sir; mostly attributed to ostracism both in church and in society, particularly among women.

Deposition of Jacob M. Whitaker.

Jacob M. Whitaker, being sworn, deposes as follows:

Q. What is your name, age, occupation, and place of residence?

A. My name is Jacob M. Whitaker; going into sixty-one; my occupation has been farming; Duval County, Florida.

Q. Were you present on the 5th day of November last at precinct known as Price's precinct, Gravelly Hill, Duval County, at an election where Horatio Bisbee, jr., and Noble A. Hull were candidates? If so, when did you get there and how long did you stay there?

A. I was present; I got there about half past seven in the morning; I remained there till about eight o'clock at night, when the returns were sealed up.

Q. Were you inside or outside the polls?

A. Outside.

Q. If you saw any acts of intimidation or any interference on the part of any one, or any act on the part of any one tending to prevent or hinder a free exercise of ballot at the polls at that precinct on that day, state what the acts were, who they were committed by, and all you have to say about it without any further questions.

A. I did see acts of intimidation, or what I term so. There were some twenty-five or thirty colored republican voters; one carried a gun, one a sword, the others armed with big sticks. The first acts of intimidation—when they were requested to nominate a third inspector, the republican inspector being absent, frankly and positively refused to do so, stating that the polls should not be opened until Joseph E. Lee and John Perry got there, using boisterous language, and waving their sticks round. When a third inspector was nominated by the two present, they responded in a loud voice, those that had the clubs, &c., and voted those nominees out, saying that the polls should not be opened until Mr. Lee or Mr. Perry got there. At forty minutes past eight o'clock a. m. Mr. Perry arrived at the polls and took his seat, and the polls were opened. The voting then went on till about twelve o'clock. About eleven o'clock a colored man walked up near the polls to vote for Mr. Hull. A crowd gathered round him and backed him off about fifteen or twenty steps. I saw the trouble—rumpus; ran to them and inquired what was the matter. This colored man that wanted to vote the ticket told me they would not let him vote as he wanted to. At that time two or three of them cried out, "You shan't vote that ticket." I called him by name; told him to vote as he pleased, and I'd see him protected. They then ordered me to go way; I had nothing to do with it. I told them I did have something to do with it and to stop their rowing. They repeated again, "You have got nothing to do with it." I then called the deputy sheriff, Mr. William H. Carter. Mr. Carter came up, and near the same time Mr. W. S. Picket; among us we got the row quashed. That is about all the acts of intimidation.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, the republican party owes its success more to northern prejudice against the South than to any other cause. Republican politicians have not been slow to observe that the prejudices of the North could be wrought upon by stories of intimidation, fraud, and violence in the South, and heretofore they have made effective use of this means of perpetuating power. At the last election, as every gentleman here knows, this question was made the principal issue in the Northern States, and nothing contributed more to prejudice the minds of our people against the South and southern institutions than the circulation of a book written by Judge Tourgee, entitled A Fool's Errand, purporting to give a narrative of the writer's experience in North Carolina. This book found its way into every household in the North. I am told that the national republican campaign committee subscribed for and circulated over 200,000 copies of this book as a campaign document. I do not vouch for the truth of the statement, but give it for what it is worth.

No one can read that book and give it the least credence without finding his mind more or less poisoned against the people of the South; and I will say that if the writer's picture of atrocious brutality practiced on the inoffensive colored people be a true one; if the colored people are wholly at the mercy of a cruel, relentless, lawless people who deny them protection under the law and whip and murder them without let or hinderance because they vote the republican ticket, as the writer would have us believe, no one should read it without feeling a just indignation against a people who would thus violate the laws of God and man. But if the writer's picture be not a true one; if the state of affairs as described by him be all a myth, what will we say of a man who will write, and of a party that will circulate an infamous libel on the people of one section of the country in order to poison and prejudice the minds of another simply to obtain votes and perpetuate political power?

I am told by gentlemen from that State—members of Congress residing in the district where the writer of the Fool's Errand locates the principal events of his book—that there is not a particle of truth in the statement of the supposed events which he describes; that no such state of affairs as he describes ever existed there; that on the contrary, in the localities where he describes the most atrocious outrages to have occurred, the white and colored people have always been on the most friendly and peaceable terms, and that neither outrage nor intimidation was ever practiced, and that the colored people have always exercised the same political freedom enjoyed by the whites. The same gentlemen tell me that Judge Tourgee lived in that section for many years, was elected to the office of judge of the court, which he held for ten years, enjoyed the same social and political privileges that any one else did, and that his book is a gross and infamous libel upon the people among whom he lived on terms of social equality, and whose hospitality he enjoyed.

Mr. Speaker, I do not know Judge Tourgee. I do know the gentlemen from North Carolina with whom I have conversed, and I know them to be gentlemen whose veracity I would not doubt for a moment, and for one I take no stock in the Fool's Errand. The best answer to the statements in that book is to be found in a paragraph I noticed in a paper a day or two since, to the effect that Judge Tourgee was about to return to his old home in North Carolina, to take up his permanent residence there.

Some time since I noticed going the rounds of the press a statement to the effect that one Mrs. Ellen Campbell, a northern lady, who had been employed as superintendent of the North Carolina deaf, dumb, and blind institute, had been discharged from her position because in a private letter to a friend in Massachusetts she had spoken of the Fool's Errand as being a true picture of southern society. I append the following from the Cincinnati Commercial, of date December 30:

NORTH CAROLINA JUSTICE.

[Special to the Cincinnati Commercial.]

WASHINGTON, December 30.

The State authorities of North Carolina will not allow an indorsement of the Fool's Errand book to go unpunished. For many years Mrs. Ellen Campbell has been superintendent of the North Carolina deaf, dumb, and blind institute. In a private letter to a friend in Massachusetts she spoke of the Fool's Errand book as being a true picture of southern life. This observation was printed in a Massachusetts rural paper and traveled back to North Carolina. The State authorities discovered it and discharged Mrs. Campbell.

Mr. Speaker, the foregoing item had a widespread circulation throughout the country, and as far as I know has never been contradicted, and whoever has read and credited the tales told in Fool's Errand would take the foregoing as further confirmation of the intolerant spirit of southern society. Having curiosity to know how much truth there was in this statement, I got my friend from North Carolina, Mr. DAVIS, to write and ascertain the true facts in the case. In reply to his inquiries, the governor of North Carolina, Hon. Thomas J. Jarvis, and Mr. Gudger, principal of the deaf and dumb institute, wrote Mr. DAVIS that Mrs. Campbell, in the first place, was not superintendent of the institution, but was employed to give lessons in cooking; that she filled that position for about four months to the satisfaction of the board; that at the close of the session in June, 1880, she went North with the understanding that she was to return and continue her instructions in October; that in September she wrote the principal, Mr. Gudger, saying that she could not return in October on account of ill health, and asked to have her time extended, which was done. On the 22d of November she again wrote, stating that ill health prevented her returning, and asked to be relieved from further service. The board met and consented to accept her resignation as requested, which fact was communicated to her, and in reply to which she wrote the principal, Mr. Gudger, thanking the board for their kindness, expressing her kindest regards toward all the friends with whom she had been associated. I herewith print as part of my remarks the letter of the governor, also the letters of Mrs. Campbell.

NORTH CAROLINA, EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
Raleigh, January 8, 1881.

DEAR SIR: Yours of the 5th instant came to hand this morning, and I reply at once. Mrs. Helen Campbell was employed by the board of directors of the asylum for the deaf, dumb, and the blind to give lessons in cooking, which she did with entire success and satisfaction for about four months. The session of the school closed in June, 1880, and Mrs. Campbell returned North.

By her engagements she was to return in October to continue her instructions, but in September she wrote Mr. Gudger, the principal of the institution, that her health was such that she could not return at the opening of the session, and asked to have her time extended, which was done by the board.

On the 22d day of November she wrote Mr. Gudger the following letter, to wit:

"STAUNTON, VIRGINIA, November 22, 1880.

"DEAR SIR: I wrote you last week that I expected to be in Raleigh for lessons on the 8th and 9th of December, beginning my course from those dates. I find myself, physically, almost unable for the work required, and it is very doubtful if I may not be obliged to return home at any time to avoid breaking down altogether.

"For this reason, and supposing you would dislike any uncertainty quite as much as myself, I should be glad to be released from my engagement with you. I think that Miss Turlington could, by practice, acquire the ability to teach small classes; and it is possible that another year, with stronger health and more favorable circumstances, I could arrange for a course with you, though I have not found the climate favorable. You will understand that I hold myself bound to fulfill my part of the contract, should you insist, but feel that it will probably be impossible to carry it out.

"May I ask for an immediate reply, thus obliging,

"Yours, very truly,

"HELEN CAMPBELL.

"H. A. GUDGER, Esq."

The board, called together by the principal to consider the application, agreed to relieve Mrs. Campbell of her engagements. Of this action she was duly notified by Mr. Gudger, and to his letter she made the following response:

"STAUNTON, VIRGINIA, November 25, 1880.

"DEAR MR. GUDGER: Many thanks for your prompt reply to my letter and to the board for their action.

"If I can be of the least service in cooking matters at any time pray call upon me, and believe me, with best wishes for the institute and all friends there,

"Yours, very truly,

"HELEN CAMPBELL."

Mrs. Campbell has not been in Raleigh since May, 1880, and could not have written any letter from here in the fall, as she was reported to have done. Mrs. Campbell saw nothing of the people of North Carolina except what she saw of the people of Raleigh during her four months' stay here. While here she demeaned herself as a lady and was treated by all as such. She never received anything but uniform kindness and courtesy from our people, and this I am sure she will admit.

This is a full and accurate account of Mrs. Campbell's connection with the institution and the way it ended. It will be observed that her application in September for an extension of her leave of absence on account of her ill health was made before her reported indorsement of the Fool's Errand was written. Not one word had passed, as I am informed, from any member of the board or any one else to her that her services were not desired, and her resignation was purely voluntary; and I take it when she asked to be relieved on account of bad health that she gave the true reason and did not make it a pretext.

* * * * * * *

I am, very truly, yours,

THOS. J. JARVIS.

Hon. JOS. J. DAVIS,
House of Representatives, Washington, District of Columbia.

Thus you see, Mr. Speaker, this supplement to the Fool's Errand, on investigation, explodes and proves to have been nothing more than a miserable, lying, political canard, and I doubt not that nine-tenths of the stories of southern political outrages which do campaign duty in the North, if investigated, would prove to be of the same character.

In 1878 the author of Fool's Errand ran for Congress against the present member from that district, [Mr. SCALES,] receiving 7,680 out of 18,006 votes cast at the election, which was 3,321 less votes than the republican candidate received in 1876 and 3,943 less votes than the republican candidate received in 1880 for the same office; which (to put it as mildly and delicately as I can) has a tendency to show that the gentleman is not very popular with his own party in that locality. Whether his defeat and having run behind his ticket influenced him in any manner in writing Fool's Errand I do not know; but I am fully convinced that the book has gone a great way toward perpetuating sectional prejudice and sectional animosity, which had begun to die out, and in that respect has done infinite mischief.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FINLEY] has expired. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. ROTHWELL.]

Mr. FINLEY. I desire to inquire of the Chair how much time I had remaining when I took the floor to-day?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Only thirty minutes. The rest of the gentleman's hour he had yielded when the bill was last under consideration to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RYON.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. BURCH, its Secretary, announced the adoption of the conference report on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 6969) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes.

It further announced the adoption of the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 6613) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic service of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes.

It further announced the adoption of the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 6730) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes.

It further announced that the Senate insisted upon its amendment to the bill (H. R. No. 3788) granting an increase of pension to William Hamill, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and had appointed Mr. WITHERS, Mr. DAVIS of Illinois, and Mr. KIRKWOOD, as managers of said conference on its part.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HUBBELL, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported back the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 6532) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes, recommending concurrence in the second and third amendments, and non-concurrence in the first and fourth; and the bill and amendments were laid upon the table, to be called up at the first opportunity for action.

APPORTIONMENT OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Mr. ROTHWELL. I yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. STEELE.]

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Speaker, no intelligent man can read the Constitution without concluding that numbers, and numbers only, were regarded by the fathers as the proper foundation for the distribution of Representatives among the States. Certainly prior to the adoption of the fourteenth amendment, in which those States, as States, which are the theme of many an apparent patriotic utterance on this floor, took no part, no such idea as voters ever entered the head of any one who even claimed for himself the possession of a scintilla of statesmanship. Even after its adoption numbers constituted the only foundation of representation, to be abridged only when a State should restrict the right of suffrage for any other cause than crime. No one now contends—I mean no intelligent man—that any other abridgment than that done by a State through some process of legislation can, by the fourteenth amendment, operate so as to reduce representation. The conduct of ten, or a hundred, or a thousand men, either in purchasing or intimidating voters, cannot be construed as affecting the rights of the States to full representation on this floor, for the acts of individuals cannot be regarded as the act of the State. Above all, no man of sense could insist that the representative strength of a State ought to be determined by the number of persons who exercised the right of suffrage at the election just preceding the apportionment.

If such should be the rule it is easy to see how a party in a minority in any given State could wreak its vengeance on the majority by refusing to vote at the election. In some of the Southern States it is well known that a pretended order from the leaders in this city or elsewhere could easily be used by the few not always scrupulous leaders of one of the parties to keep nine-tenths of the negroes at home on the day of the election, and thus weaken the electoral power of the States. That such a course would be pursued, even if it has not already been done, no man who has watched the course of certain self-styled statesmen can hesitate a moment to believe. The spectacle would then be exhibited of States robbed of their legitimate power in the House of Representatives by the needs of political tricksters, caring nothing for the well-being of those whose fancied wrongs they deplore and thinking of nothing but the perpetuation of their own power.

I heartily concur in the opinion expressed by the gentleman from New York, that whatever may be the meaning of the second clause of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution, it was never designed for but one section of the country. Its whole purpose was attained by the establishment of a subsequent addition to the organic law, by which no State can abridge the right to the ballot on account of "race, color, or previous condition of servitude." That amendment was made for party purposes, and not for the good of the country.

It will be seen with regard to the fourteenth amendment that the Secretary of State, in officially announcing its ratification by the Legislatures of the States, uses some very peculiar language, which may give the future historian a little trouble in comprehending. He speaks of the action of the Legislatures of a number of the States—less than the requisite number—and then announces the fact that certain other "bodies, avowing themselves to be and acting as the Legislatures" of six other States, had agreed to the amendment, making it a part of the Constitution. It would seem that Mr. Seward had some doubts as to the legitimacy of the "claims" which were made by these bodies. I confess to sharing in that doubt, but concede that by lapse of time and years of submission the article in question is a binding part of the Constitution.

Mr. Speaker, I am the sincere advocate of a free election and a fair return of the result. It may be well to inquire what a free election is. All will agree that whenever all the citizens having a right to vote at an election shall have full and unrestrained liberty to go to the ballot-box and indicate their choice, without fraud or undue influence, the election is free. The constitution of my State, ever since it was established, in 1776, has contained the declaration, as one of the cardinal principles of free government, "that all elections ought to be free."

But what is a free election? Is it free when no threats of personal violence are made? It may be; but it is not necessarily so. Is it free when armed men do not take possession of the polls and drive away all who are not ready to do their bidding? Cannot the freedom of action of men be controlled by other means equally reprehensible in the eyes of those who wish to be just? Is it a free election even in name if the proprietor of a large landed estate having many tenants informs them that if they do not vote as he does they will lose their leases and have to seek new homes? Is it a free election if the owner of a cotton or iron mill who has hundreds of persons in his employment shall tell them that in the event a candidate whose election he opposes is chosen by the people his business will stop and they will lose their chance of labor and the bread which it produces? Is it a free election when the votes of men who suppose themselves to be free are bought and sold to the highest bidder? In my opinion none of these cases are included in the meaning of the words which North Carolina has embalmed in her constitution. All such conduct is a gross violation of the freedom of elections; and yet some men upon this floor bedew the country with their tears of sorrow over one of these outrages but are significantly silent as to the others. Why is this? There can be but one reason. One of the offenses is supposed, or rather said, by them to exist in the South alone.

Possibly an equally potent influence not recognized by law may be used in the sections which boast of their advanced civilization, and which influence is at war with the freedom of elections which is the essence of free government. A truly free election is conducted in all respects as our law has it in regard to the action of a married woman in the conveyance of her real estate. She must convey "without fear, compulsion, or undue influence on the part of her husband or any other person." So a voter should always cast his ballot. "Undue influence" is as fatal as "fear" or "compulsion." Compared with this, how many elections are free in some parts of our country represented on this floor by men who boast of their purity and denounce so fiercely the wrongdoing of others? Is it possible that some of these gentlemen resort to the plan of pointing out evils in sections remote so as to blind the people at home and prevent their seeing rottenness within "the visual line which circles them?" Let them remove the "motes" which are in their own eyes.

The basis of votes, or even voters, would be an exceedingly unjust one. The law favors the vigilant and not the slothful; and if a man having the right to vote chooses not to exercise it, no one is to blame but himself. If he is prevented from the use of his franchise by force, fraud, or undue influence, they who interfere should be made to suffer for their infractions of the law. Fraud and undue influence are used quite as often to control elections as force and are equally to be condemned. But it must be remembered that males over the age of twenty-one years do not bear the same proportion to the entire population in all parts of the country. In New England there are more males over twenty-one years in every thousand of population than in any of the Southern States. Why this is so I shall not inquire. It may be the result of an advanced civilization. The South has hitherto regarded the doctrine as true that "children are a heritage of the Lord, and blessed is he who hath his quiver full of them." We are a prolific people, and if let alone will build up our waste places without the advantage of immigration and by a resort only to our natural resources.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS] saw proper a few days ago to inform this House that the people of the North believed that the census of the South had not been fairly taken, and that our section of the Union would get undue representation on this floor. He stated also that he had made this assertion upon the hustings in his State, and felt bound to repeat it in the House of Representatives. I do not gainsay the statement. It is well known that these charges were made by persons of the gentleman's party in anticipation of any work of enumeration. I do not doubt that this suspicion exists and is honestly entertained by many of the gentleman's constituents. And I am equally well satisfied that the gentleman himself is in no small degree responsible for the existence of the opinion. But for the unjust, I will not say unworthy, conduct of the gentleman and others, no such feelings would find a lodgment among his people. It is only part of the scheme of detraction by which the South is to be used as a stepping-stone for "vaulting ambition," which hesitates at nothing so selfish ends are subserved. I venture to say that the enumerators in the South were in all respects equal in character to either the gentleman himself or to any member upon this floor. I know it is so in the immediate section of country in which I live.

I confess I was astonished at the course which the gentleman saw proper to pursue. He has made a grave charge against the integrity of the persons employed by the Census Bureau, as well as a very large number of the people of the South, and also against his own peers upon the floor of the House of Representatives. Such charges, I submit, are entirely unwarranted, unless the gentleman is prepared to furnish the proof. Certainly they ought not to be made simply upon the suggestions of a vivid imagination. I place my assertion in opposition to his, and say that in my opinion a census of the inhabitants of the Southern States, honestly taken, will show now a fair increase of the number reported by the Superintendent. But if the gentleman wishes the enumeration to serve a party purpose, and can succeed in accomplishing his wishes, I doubt not he can get employed for that purpose a set of men who can bring out the figures to meet the exact wants of certain self-styled statesmen of the country.

I regard a large constituency as dangerous to free institutions. The nearer a member is to the people who send him as their legislative agent the more apt is he to know and regard their interests. If the time shall ever come in the history of this people when the congressional districts are so populous that a member of Congress is personally unknown to a large majority of the people, the age of intrigue and corruption will have arrived. It is true that a small body is more wieldy than a large one, but for this very reason it is more easily controlled by artfulness and corruption. Even now, with the power of the House of Representatives lodged in the hands of a few committees, chosen by the Speaker, we have legislation practically controlled in this country by one man. I do not charge that this power is used corruptly, but I do say that there is danger of this result. This trouble may be removed by an alteration of the rules. But it is true that small bodies are more easily swayed by undue means. My own opinion is that comparatively small constituencies are essential to the maintenance of good government, and I would regard it as a great evil if the basis of representation shall ever become larger than one hundred and sixty thousand of population. Of course there will be inconveniences attending a large House, but the good will far overbalance the evil.

I know it is said that we have confusion enough now with less than three hundred members. In this Hall there would be confusion with less than one hundred. The principles of acoustics were either unknown to the architect who planned it or were utterly disregarded in an insane desire to add to the adornments of the walls and ceiling. Certainly the laws of health were entirely ignored, when the chamber was made a pen, cut off from the air and light of Heaven, where members breathe for hours an atmosphere which is equal to the "vapors of a dungeon." A large House would be justified if for no other reason than that it would necessitate making the Hall approach nearer the light of day.

I care not as to what influence a particular number may have upon sectional strength. The only worthy reason which can be given is one relating to justice and efficiency. Sectional struggles should end in a universal desire to advance the prosperity of every portion of a common country. My own section yearns for peace and the establishment of good government. If let alone, we shall work out our own destiny. If we shall succeed, by the influences of soil, climate, and productions, in becoming, before many decades, one of "the fairest of the fair" parts of a great country, bright with life and prosperity and wealth and happiness, we shall, I trust, be thankful to God for His blessings to us; and not for His frowns upon others. We shall rise yet in the scale of material and mental wealth. The logic of the census cannot be resisted; and when the Almighty Ruler of the Universe shall allow the twentieth century to dawn on this free Republic, this glorious Union of States, bound together by the ligaments of a written Constitution and common interests, the now despised "land of the cypress and the myrtle" will send to Heaven its joyful praises in the hum of its wheels of industry, its development of untold mineral wealth, and its production of all things necessary to the happiness of mankind.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair begs the indulgence of the House to make a statement and a request. On the last day when this bill was under consideration, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FINLEY] being entitled to the floor for one hour, yielded five minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. KITCHIN,] and two minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. COFFROTH.] To-day the Chair was under the impression that the gentleman from Ohio had but thirty minutes remaining, while the fact is that he had fifty-three minutes; so that by an error of the Chair the gentleman has been deprived to-day of twenty-three minutes to which he was entitled. The Chair therefore asks consent of the House that the gentleman may be now recognized.

There was no objection.

Mr. FINLEY. I do not care now to resume my remarks, but will yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. DAVIS.]

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I am exceedingly obliged to my friend from Ohio [Mr. FINLEY] for his kindness in yielding to me. It would have been very agreeable to me, sir, if, after the admirable address made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] in presenting this subject, which seemed to give satisfaction to all sides, this discussion could have ended, and we could have had a vote. But it has not been the pleasure of the House to adopt that course; and the debate has taken a political turn, unfortunately I think, and the animosity of some gentlemen on the other side toward the South has found expression in criticisms that require some notice. On the other side there has been a great deal said about the population of the South and fraud in elections; and some gentlemen have gone so far as to intimate that they are not willing to make any apportionment until there can be an inquiry to ascertain whether in the South there has been a fair census and free elections, and others intimate that they wish the apportionment made according to votes, and not according to population. The Constitution makes it our duty to make an apportionment of Representatives, and it prescribes that the apportionment shall be according to population.

Now, sir, a few words in regard to the census. The second section of article 14, known as the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution, declares that—

> Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed.

There is a further provision which eliminates from the enumeration when any male citizens of the United States, being twenty-one years of age, are denied the right to vote for any cause other than participation in rebellion or other crime, the proportion of population "which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens twenty-one years of age" in any State thus abridging the right to vote. The second section of article 1 of the Constitution declares:

> The actual enumeration shall be made within three years after the first meeting of the Congress of the United States, and within every subsequent term of ten years, in such manner as they shall by law direct.

Now, these provisions of the Constitution are clear and cannot be misunderstood. Certainly no Southern State has by its constitution or laws denied to any of its citizens the right to vote for any cause except those mentioned in the Constitution. The Constitution makes the apportionment according to population, and not according to the number of votes cast, which may be greater or smaller, according to the importance of the election, the popularity of candidates, or the inducements which may carry people to the polls. The idea of apportionment according to the vote is as impracticable and absurd as it is unconstitutional.

But gentlemen challenge the accuracy of the census so far as it relates to the States of the South. Some of them say it is not possible that there can be such an increase as is shown. They think there ought not to be such an increase of population, and they therefore conclude that the census is wrong and raise the cry of fraud. This census has been taken in pursuance of a law of the United States, the fairness and justice of which no fair mind can question. There is at the head of the Census Bureau a gentleman whose character, integrity, learning, skill, and attainments eminently fit him for the place and give a guarantee of absolute honesty in the administration of the office, and no well-informed person will venture to say that he is not qualified for the duties of the office. He has the superintendence and direction of the work; and while the enumeration has been conducted by a large number of persons these have been selected with care and are men of character, no individual one of whom, so far as I have heard, has been even suspected of any fraudulent conduct in office. That the work is accurate to a man in enumerating over fifty millions of people no one would venture to say; such perfection would not be for mortals; but that the population has been exaggerated by false or fraudulent reports is a baseless charge, without a single fact to sustain it, and is so reckless that it can only be accounted for by the blinding power of prejudice.

I assume, then, and the facts warrant the assumption, as every fair man upon reflection must admit, that the enumeration shows, as accurately as is attainable, the population of this country, and the Constitution comes in and declares how the apportionment shall be made. If the South has an increase in population then the Constitution gives to her a corresponding increase in representation, and it is our duty to obey the Constitution, and there is no "higher law" for the good citizen than obedience to his legal oath and to the Constitution. The census of 1880 shows an increase of population throughout the Union that should gratify every patriot. It has shown a gratifying increase in the South, and this, which it seems to me should be a source of joy to every good citizen, is to some of our friends a source of anger. The increased prosperity of any section of this great Union of States ought to be a source of pride and joy to good people in every section of it. I have no doubt, as is clearly shown by General Walker, that much of our increase in the South since 1870 is only apparent, and is due to the failure of the census takers in 1870 to enumerate fully the population; but there has been undoubtedly a large real increase, and years ago our republican friends predicted this increase. In the days of slavery, when they were in a bad humor with us, because, under a Constitution which their fathers and our fathers made, we inherited slaves, descended from the slaves which our fathers purchased of their fathers and which their fathers acquired in some kind of profitable trade with slave-stealing kings of African tribes, they told us that if we would emancipate the slaves we would prosper and grow in wealth and numbers and rejoice at the change. Well, the slave has been emancipated for more than fifteen years, and we are increasing and prospering as well as we can, and for this they are angry with us, and in the face of the fact and their own prophecy they deny that we have thus increased. Oh, how unreasonable and unreasoning is prejudice!

But, Mr. Speaker, some gentlemen not seeing any way to get around the census, and apparently conceding the question of population, attack the elections in the South, and much has been said in regard to voting there. The principal charge now made seems to be that they do not vote enough. One gentleman complains, for instance, that in the last election, the State of Louisiana cast only 97,201, and she has six members of this House. Well, that was a modest vote for Louisiana, but then in 1876, when Mr. Tilden received an immense majority of the popular vote of this country, she gave 160,875, and our republican friends said she voted too much and their returning board threw out 16,316 votes, so it is not an easy matter for us to please gentlemen, whether we vote or refrain from voting. Now, sir, without going into details, I desire to say that during the period of reconstruction, when nearly every man who by reason of experience and intelligence was qualified or fit for office was disfranchised or excluded from office, and characterless adventurers, known as carpet-baggers, and the then recently emancipated freedmen had political control of the States, there was, as was to have been expected, as the natural consequence of the ignorant or corrupt legislation and administration of the laws, some disorder and lawlessness. The well-meaning and honestly disposed colored man, entirely ignorant of courts and laws and legislation, was, as a magistrate or legislator, but as wax in the hands of the unscrupulous carpet-bagger; and this was an unnatural state of society which could not last in harmony with a republican form of government, which must have for its foundation intelligence as well as virtue.

All the individual cases of outrage—all the isolated acts of lawlessness which are so magnified and exaggerated, and which are preserved, repaired, enlarged, revised, improved, and nursed so carefully from year to year by our republican friends, and which are paraded in every canvass to arouse and keep alive the passions and prejudices of misinformed people, and which constitute the basis of much of their campaign literature and fiction to mislead the honest people of the North, were perpetrated under these governments, which were neither democratic, aristocratic, nor monarchic, but which were entirely novel in the history of state-craft, and may be called kakocratic, in which the intelligent, the wise, the experienced, and the virtuous were excluded from office and the polls and the bad or the ignorant selected to rule. As democratic means the rule of the people, so kakocratic means the rule of the bad. It was a style of government unknown to any of the earlier writers upon the elementary principles of government and law, for, until the days of reconstruction, it was never dreamed that there would or could be a government in which the intelligent and capable were to be excluded from all participation and the bad or the ignorant selected to rule. It has been the good fortune of the South to have again democratic rule—the rule of the people instead of kakocratic rule; and since the democratic party came into power there has been as little of lawlessness and disorder in the South as in any other section of the Union, and there has been as little of fraud and corruption in elections there as in the States at the North, not excepting the good voting States of Ohio and Indiana. I can say for my own State of North Carolina that there has been as much freedom of political action there as can be found in any State in this Union.

There has been as much freedom of discussion there, for in our campaigns we have joint discussions, and from the mountains to the sea the people by hundreds and thousands have been addressed by democratic and republican speakers from the same stand, and a case of disturdance or disorder is of rare occurrence. I doubt whether there is a State in this Union whose elections are so free or where there is so little of fraud and intimidation as there is in North Carolina. So far as my own knowledge goes, I know of no improper attempts to influence voters in that State except by the assessments of Federal officers to the amount of 10 per cent. upon their receipts, with the assurance that a prompt remittance would be remembered, and the intimidation of colored voters inclined to vote the democratic ticket by persons of their own color.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I propose to review briefly some of the statements made by gentlemen on the other side, and I first call attention to some remarks made the other day by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. KEIFER.] He said:

> Turning aside for one moment in this discussion, I will say that there are some other remarkable figures and facts worked out under this census. My own State will not suffer on a basis of voting population, if such a basis could be adopted (and I do not say it could) under the Constitution. Ohio, I am happy to say, has a people not only free to vote when election day comes, but a people educated to vote, and who do vote. Let me state a fact that may not have been noted. At the election in November last, Ohio cast 103,046 more votes than were cast in the great state of Illinois, with substantially the same population, the population of Illinois being 3,078,769 as against 3,198,239 in Ohio. Now, this larger vote in Ohio comes from the freedom of the people to vote and also (for they are as free in Illinois) from the education of the people in the matter of voting. We have first tried before the people of Ohio the great issues of this country. We have tried the great financial issues there in advance of the nation. First in 1875 we fought the battle, and we won the financial victory as it has been won since by the people of this whole country.
> The election returns coupled with the vote at the late election show some curious results in the North and West in the ability or willingness of the people to vote. Take the table of figures made up in round numbers, as follows:

| States. | Vote. | Population. | Per cent. |
|---|---|---|---|
| Illinois | 622,000 | 3,100,000 | 1 in 5.0 |
| Ohio | 725,000 | 3,200,000 | 1 in 4.4 |
| Indiana | 575,000 | 2,000,000 | 1 in 3.4 |
| Iowa | 323,000 | 1,600,000 | 1 in 5.4 |
| Kansas | 201,000 | 1,000,000 | 1 in 5.0 |

It will be seen that Indiana is a good voting State.

The now good roads and accessibility of voting places in Ohio and Indiana may have something to do with the voters getting to the polls in a larger per cent. than in some other States.

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOBE] has given figures from the Southern States which in comparison to these would astonish the country if it was not already aware that something terrible was the matter with the voting population in those States.

Ah! Mr. Speaker, they were educated to vote, some of them to vote early and to vote often, I fear, as I will show by the gentleman's own figures presently. Ohio is a great State, and the gentleman assumes much for it. A friend of mine in North Carolina once, commenting on what he conceived to be an arrogant habit of some Virginians, said "they were a presumious, assumious, and usurpious race." [Laughter.] I think the observation may be applied with some force to the people of the State of Ohio at this time.

This gentleman from Ohio says there is one voter for every 3.4 of the population of the State of Indiana. I have examined his figures and I have examined the census. If his statement be true, then Indiana gave about 130,000 more votes than she has male population over twenty-one years of age entitled to vote. As any one who will examine the census will find, there is not a State in this Union, unless possibly it be Colorado, that can honestly give one vote for every 3.4 of its population.

Mr. NEW. Will the gentlemen permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. Certainly.

Mr. NEW. The statement made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] in the speech referred to, of the vote cast in Indiana, was grossly incorrect. The error, no doubt, was unintentional. That gentleman placed the vote at 575,000. This number is greater by 104,262 than the vote cast at the election in October, and greater by 104,328 than the vote cast at the election in November.

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. My friend from Indiana is correct as to the vote cast by his State. It was about 104,000 less than stated by the gentleman from Ohio. I do not know where the gentleman from Ohio obtained his figures. The actual vote was 470,672, but that is a larger vote than the State can fairly cast. I find that in 1870, according to the census, there were 376,700 citizens in Indiana entitled to vote. This was her full voting population. The census of 1880 shows the increase in the population of that State to be 17 per cent. Now, assuming that the voting population has increased in the same ratio—that is 17 per cent.—it would be, in exact numbers, 440,739. The vote cast was 470,672, or 29,933 more than the State would be entitled to according to the ratio of increase indicated by the census, if every voter went to the polls, which is never the case.

Mr. NEW. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him again?

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. Certainly.

Mr. NEW. I wish to inquire what information has been obtained from the Census Bureau, if any, or other authentic source, showing that the male adult population of Indiana is not enough larger than the adult female population to account for what you regard as an excess of voters in Indiana?

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. I will answer my friend. It is natural that he should be solicitous about any statement touching the reputation of his State. The census has not yet been so completed and tabulated as to show the number of male citizens entitled to vote in Indiana, but, as I have already stated, the rate of increase in the population of Indiana has been 17 per cent. I think it is a fraction in excess of that, but it will not vary materially. The entire male population of all ages, as given by the census of 1880, is 1,010,676; the male population in 1870 was 857,994, and the voting population, according to the census of 1870, was 376,780. Now, if the voting population has increased in the same ratio with the male population, we will have this result, 857,994 : 376,780 :: 1,010,676 : 443,828; which is 26,844 less than the vote cast. So that unless the voting population has increased out of all proportion, as compared either with the entire population or as compared with the male population of all ages, she has given in the one case 29,933, and in the other 26,844, more votes than she has voting population. Truly did the gentleman from Ohio say: "It will be seen that Indiana is a good voting State."

It was an October State, and a victory there was deemed absolutely necessary to assure success to the republican party. To this end it was essential to increase her voting population, and the increase was made. The contest was abandoned in many of the Southern States. I believe the reason was truly stated by the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] when, in answer to the question, "Why no contest in the South?" he said: "Because the republicans abandoned the contest in the South and undertook to buy votes enough to answer their purpose in the North." Can any one doubt that the votes were purchased? There was an army of republican office-holders at work, and assessments to the amount of hundreds of thousands of dollars were made on Federal office-holders. Was this immense sum for any honest purpose? Who can tell the influence it had upon the patriotic republican vote in Indiana and Ohio, so happily paraded by the gentleman from Ohio? How much of it aided the exodus of the colored voters from the South when the contest was abandoned? One of the republican managers of the exodus movement to Indiana complained that there were too many women and children among the exodusters. He said they wanted more "bucks." This was the epithet applied by him to the colored voters. It was by these methods, more than by good roads, that the vote of Ohio and Indiana was so large.

The voting population (that is her whole male population entitled to vote) of Ohio in 1870 was, according to the census of that year, 592,350. Her population increased 19 per cent. This ratio of increase applied to her voting population would give her a voting population in 1880 of 704,896. She gave 724,967 votes, which was more by 20,071 votes than she had male voting population twenty-one years old. If her voting population increased only at the same rate with her other population, then she gave 20,071 more votes than she was entitled to if every man entitled to a vote had gone to the polls. Can any one suppose that this increase in her voting population was not produced by similar causes that increased the vote in Indiana? for Ohio, too, was an October State. No wonder that some gentlemen should prefer an apportionment upon the basis of voters, for there are no people so well "educated to vote" as are the people of Ohio and Indiana, especially in presidential years. So much for that. I have only time to comment upon Indiana and Ohio, because they were selected for special commendation by the gentleman from Ohio. I do not doubt that their voting population was increased by stupendous frauds.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have alluded to the method by which the vote has been increased. The colored vote was mobilized. Without it Mr. Garfield would not and could not have been elected. That vote was cast almost solidly for him, and yet he lacked about 300,000 votes of getting a majority of the popular vote of the United States, and there was more than one million majority of the white vote against him.

I have alluded to the influence of republican office-holders in controlling the elections. In this connection I wish to commend to the thinking public the following paragraph from the last annual message of Mr. Hayes. Speaking of civil service, he says:

> In my former annual messages I have asked the attention of Congress to the urgent necessity of a reformation of the civil-service system of the Government. My views concerning the dangers of patronage, or appointments for personal or partisan considerations, have been strengthened by my observation and experience in the Executive office, and I believe these dangers threaten the stability of the Government. Abuses so serious in their nature cannot be permanently tolerated. They tend to become more alarming with the enlargement of administrative service, as the growth of the country in population increases the number of officers and placemen employed.

Now, sir, this sounds a note of warning and alarm that ought to be heeded by the country. It loses none of its force by reason of the fact that its most corrupt and corrupting abuses were practiced under the administration of Mr. Hayes. The fact will not be questioned that the great mass of republican office-holders, from Cabinet officers down to messengers and deputy collectors, were, for months, neglecting their legitimate duties, engaged with all the power and patronage of the Government in efforts to control the elections and perpetuate their power. Add to this the assessments made, amounting to hundreds of thousands of dollars, and the abuse becomes truly alarming. The democratic members of this House endeavored last session to correct the evil, so far at least as to prohibit assessments on office-holders, but the other side resorted to parliamentary tactics known as filibustering, to defeat the bill, and we could not pass it.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire to allude to a matter that affects my own State. The other day when we had a contested-election case up from the State of North Carolina, the gentleman from New York [Mr. VAN VOORHIS] commenced his speech by saying:

> It is easier for a camel to pass through a needle's eye than for a republican elected to Congress from any district in thirteen States of this Union to get and keep his seat.

And then he goes on to say that—

> Joseph J. Martin is the only republican in this House from these thirteen States who took his seat when this Congress began. It is now proposed to oust him from that seat. These thirteen States have seventy-one Representatives in this House. We know that many districts in these States have republican majorities, and there is scarcely a doubt that they elected republicans to this Congress who have been unable to obtain their seats. They failed to run the gauntlet of the democratic returning boards. Upon one pretext or another, they never got so far as to receive the legal certificates of their election.

I say, Mr. Speaker, that it is easier for a camel to pass through the eye of a needle than it is for some persons to see the truth or to admit it when anything is brought before them which is at variance with their partisan or political views, or where anything connected with the South is at issue. The statement which is contained in that paragraph of the gentleman's speech might have been met with the fact that there are now on this floor republicans who could answer it clearly. I would ask the gentlemen who represent the second Tennessee district, the fourth Virginia, the sixth Missouri, or the third district in my own State. These will afford a sufficient answer to him. He then refers to Joseph B. Martin, and refers to him as the "chief-justice of North Carolina." Mr. Speaker, I desire to say that the chief-justice of the State of North Carolina is one of the best and purest men in this or any other land, and all assertions that he was engaged in anything of such a character as that charged in the speech of the gentleman, coming from any source, would not receive a moment's consideration from those who know him, and where the gentleman got his facts or figures I do not know.

Now, in point of fact, I understand that Mr. J. B. Martin has been three or four years at the bar, and has never held any office under the State, in or out of it, so far as I know. He certainly is not the chief-justice of that State.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. The information that had reference to this matter I got from the report of the Committee on Elections itself, which states that he was a chief-justice of a court in North Carolina.

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. Well, sir, if he was chief-justice of a court that is not chief-justice of North Carolina. But it is not true, because there was no such man as Chief-Justice Martin, of North Carolina, as the gentleman has stated in his speech.

There is but one officer in the State known by the title of chief-justice, and he is the chief-justice of the supreme court, and that position is now held by a man whose learning, virtue, and purity of character entitle him to rank with the best men of this or any country.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. If the gentleman will examine the record of that case he will see the statement made that this man is a chief-justice of a court in North Carolina, and as such I referred to him.

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. I do not know what kind of a report the committee may have acted upon or obtained their information from; but I do know what I state to be true, that the allegation that Mr. Martin was the chief-justice of North Carolina is not true.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. The gentleman from North Carolina has not read my speech carefully, or he would not make that assertion.

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. I have stated substantially the gentleman's language, but I will give it exact:

> It made no difference with the democratic returning boards that J. B. Martin, the chief-justice of a North Carolina court, the agent and friend of the contestant and his counsel on this contest, got these tickets printed and circulated them for a fraudulent purpose.
> The majority of the committee are in favor of sustaining this fraud of Chief-Justice Martin and aiding him in consummating it. If the republicans cannot rely upon the good faith of a North Carolina democratic chief-justice, then what is there in that State, which is democratic, that can be relied upon?

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I hope the gentleman from North Carolina will submit to a correction as to a statement of fact. I never asserted that this gentleman was the chief-justice of North Carolina; I stated that he was the chief-justice of a North Carolina court, and so referred to him in my speech.

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. As I have stated, I will give the exact language of the gentleman, so that there can be no mistake about it. He makes the assertion as many as three times, at least, in his speech. He states that the majority of the committee are in favor of sustaining this fraud of Chief-Justice Martin and aiding him in consummating it. The gentleman from New York knew very well that in making a statement of this kind and placing the charge of such a wrong upon a high officer of the State that it would have more weight in certain quarters than if the allegation was made that he was simply the presiding magistrate or chairman of a county court.

Mr. RUSSELL, of North Carolina. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. Yes, sir.

Mr. RUSSELL, of North Carolina. I think from the statement of the gentleman from New York himself that he referred to Mr. Martin as the chief-justice of a court in North Carolina.

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. Will the gentleman be kind enough to indicate of what court he was chief-justice?

Mr. RUSSELL, of North Carolina. I take it that he was the presiding justice of the inferior county court of Bertie County.

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. I wish to ask the gentleman if he holds any office which would entitle him to the appellation given to him by the gentleman from New York, "chief-justice of the State of North Carolina," or whether he has any civil jurisdiction whatever, or whether there is any officer in that State known as chief-justice except the chief-justice of the supreme court?

Mr. RUSSELL, of North Carolina. It is nevertheless a court, and he is the presiding justice of it.

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. Is he known as chief-justice of any court in the State of North Carolina?

Mr. RUSSELL, of North Carolina. He is the presiding justice of the court, and the term chief-justice is frequently used by lawyers in speaking of such an officer. He may well be called a chief-justice by anybody, whether a lawyer or not, because it does not take a lawyer to find that out.

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. To say that he was chief-justice of the State of North Carolina, as the gentleman from New York knows, and as I have stated, carries weight all over the land. Mr. Martin was probably what is called in North Carolina chairman of a county or inferior court. Whatever may have been his indiscretion, I am assured that he is a gentleman of high character and integrity.

Now, Mr. Speaker, let me advert for a few moments to the history of the past. As I have already stated, most of the alleged wrongs for which the South is constantly arraigned on this floor, and which seem to grow with years, had their origin while the South was under what has been called "carpet-bag rule," and, though grossly exaggerated, such as they were, they resulted from the inefficient and often corrupt legislation and administration of the laws by those in power. No definition can convey to a gentleman in the North a correct idea of what is known in the South as a "carpet-bagger." Some gentlemen commit the great mistake of supposing that the term is applied to all people of the North who settle in the South. The carpet-bagger himself encourages this false idea. There cannot be greater error. The South has a hearty welcome for all people who go there to pursue honest callings and build up their fortunes by honest industry. She never concerns herself about the political opinions of such settlers. They can express them as freely there as they can anywhere else. There are many such people in the South—many of them republicans—and whenever they cast their fortunes with our people and become interested as citizens in the welfare of the State, they meet with kind and cordial treatment. All such are gladly received from whatever section they come. These are not carpet-baggers, and I am not aware that there are any carpet-baggers now going South.

The race is fast becoming extinct; but they have been a source of evil to the South and to the North, which unfortunately is still felt. Evil to the South in this, that while they were in power they corrupted legislation by their dishonest practices and frauds, and when they were driven from power they hypocritically assumed the character of political martyrs and became the slanderers of the people whom they had robbed; evil to the North in that, even to this day they have a voice and influence which they use in poisoning the minds and hearts of her people toward the South, and thus preventing that reign of peace, good will, and harmony which is so essential to the good of all. A gentleman on this floor the other day, when my friend from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] was speaking of these political adventurers, asked, with a triumphant air, "Were not the carpet-baggers citizens of the United States?" Of course they were; and for that reason they ought to have been better men, and they deserve the greater condemnation for their dishonesty.

Let me illustrate by giving a short history of one among the best of them that I ever knew. He lived in my district and was for several years register in bankruptcy, and made a good deal of money; many a poor man in my State can tell how; his money was easily made, and he was liberal, kind-hearted, and good natured. He says himself that he spent $12,000 in 1878 to aid in carrying the State for Grant. He was among the best of his class, for he was no hypocrite, and he did not pretend to be politically honest. In fact, some people thought that he never perplexed himself with questions about honesty of any kind. He was twice elected to Congress, and represented, or rather misrepresented, the district which I am proud to represent, a district inferior to none in this Union for the purity and virtue and worth of its people, but which has within its borders a large number of colored people, whose simple and confiding natures were easily imposed upon by the artful carpet-bagger, and they elected him twice to Congress. I do them the justice to say that I think many of them would not have voted for him if they had known better, but they were then recently emancipated and enfranchised, and the Union League had absolute control over them and the carpet-baggers controlled the Union Leagues. He came to Congress, and to serve his party he did his full share in abusing the South, though I believe there was no malice in his abuse, he had no regard for the truth. During his second term he sold a cadetship, as he himself said, as a matter of favor to a friend. He was investigated. General LOGAN, then a member of this House, now a Senator, was chairman of the committee, and they were about to report in favor of his expulsion; to avoid this he resigned. His reasons for resigning were stated very candidly to the committee and can be found in full in the Congressional Globe, volume 76, 1869–'70, page 1617. I give an extract from it. He says:

> I was not aware that I was violating any of the privileges or rules of the House. As soon as I was aware that I had done wrong I endeavored to make a return as far as I could. I returned the money immediately; and I have tendered my resignation to the governor of my State, believing it is a duty of a member of Congress to make vacant the place he has disgraced. * * * Hundreds have done the same thing before and will do it again. * * * I could show that I have given $12,000 to control the presidential election in my State. * * * My resignation is in the hands of the governor of my State, I suppose. Speaker BLAINE has a copy of it; for I think it is the duty of a member of Congress to make vacant the place he has disgraced.

And John T. Dewees, once my Representative and the most candid carpet-bagger I ever knew, has not been in my district since, so far as I know. Of course, he was a citizen of the United States and a republican martyr to the principles of his party, and it was a great democratic outrage that he did not return to the State. When it is remembered that this man was sent from a district which has given to the council of the Union the services of such men as Haywood, Mangum, Badger, Graham, Saunders, Bryan, Venable, Branch, Crudup, Arrington, and Rogers, and to the services of the State such men as Cameron, Ruffin, Iredell, Nash, Gilliam, Battle, Swain, Manly, Moore, Waddell, Busbee, Miller, and others, who have lived within my memory and who have given luster to the Cabinet, the Senate, the bench, the executive, the halls of legislation, and the forum, it is not to be wondered that our people should have felt keenly the humiliation and that they should have availed themselves of the earliest opportunity to rid themselves of a party that could put such an indignity upon them.

I esteem it a great honor to have been chosen to represent the democracy of such a district, and while conscious that I have been unable to do much in their interest that I would gladly have done, I am gratified in the belief that I have done no discredit to their good name, and that I have served them with an earnest desire to promote their best interests and the best interests of the country.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. Will the gentleman yield to me that I may read a sentence of my speech to which he has referred?

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. This is the language I used about this North Carolina justice:

It made no difference with the democratic returning boards that J. B. Martin, the chief-justice of a North Carolina court, the agent and friend of the contestant, and his counsel in this contest, got these tickets printed, and circulated them for a fraudulent purpose.

That was my language.

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. Yes, sir; I will print the paragraph in full.

And where did the gentleman get the other fact he stated that Mr. Joseph J. Martin was the only republican in this House who came here from any of the thirteen States he spoke of?

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. That is a fact.

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. A fact! Ask the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. JORGENSEN.] Ask the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. HOUK.] Ask my own colleague, who was elected by republican votes, [Mr. RUSSELL.] Ask the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. URNER.]

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. Those States do not belong in the thirteen.

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. You cannot find thirteen Southern States of which the statement is true. I am not surprised now that the gentleman in speaking of J. B. Martin, who is a lawyer of only about three years at the bar, should have persisted in calling him chief-justice of North Carolina. [Here the hammer fell.] I ask leave to print some further remarks and also extracts to which I have referred.

There was no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, who informed the House that the President had approved and signed bills of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 2044) granting a pension to Martha J. Porter;

An act (H. R. No. 2548) granting a pension to Martha Neil;

An act (H. R. No. 3487) granting a pension to James Forsyth Harrison;

An act (H. R. No. 1107) granting a pension to Mrs. Elizabeth Upright;

An act (H. R. No. 1628) granting a pension to Dalton Hinchman;

An act (H. R. No. 799) granting a pension to Richard P. Taylor;

An act (H. R. No. 3098) granting a pension to Jacob Ginder;

An act (H. R. No. 859) granting a pension to William N. Scribner; and

An act (H. R. No. 1953) for the relief of Henry C. Groomes.

APPORTIONMENT OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Mr. ROTHWELL. Mr. Speaker, the duty which now lies before us is to make apportionment of Representatives among the several States of the Union. It has been truly said that no more important measure has engaged or in all probability will engage the attention of this House. It is our prerogative by the action which we shall take here to establish during the ensuing ten years the positive and relative power of each of the thirty-eight States in Congress directly, as well as indirectly their relative power in the electoral college and the choice of a President. It is, therefore, a matter of supreme importance to the States in their local interests and ambition as well as to the whole country generally that this should be done with the utmost fairness. And, sir, it occurs to me that we shall be best enabled to accomplish this purpose if we shall approach it free from every personal prejudice, preference, and predilection, as well as from the blinding influence of partisan bias, and shall deal with the matter upon simple principles of justice.

The origin of this duty and the authority for our action will be found in the terms of the Constitution itself. And if, in turning to that instrument in a matter of so grave importance, I did not find, in connection with the grant of authority, the essential features of the method of execution, I should be seriously disappointed. But I shall not be disappointed, and I turn to it in perfect confidence for all the light necessary to guide us at every step in the way of certain and just procedure. In the first place, it is declared that—

The number of Representatives shall not exceed one for every thirty thousand, but each State shall have at least one Representative.

This much, then, is fixed with absolute certainty. It insures a minimum representation in Congress always equal to the number of States, and provides against what at that time might have been considered a probable excess of representation by fixing the minimum ratio at one to 30,000 inhabitants. Beyond these well-defined boundaries there is no limit whatever, either as to ratio or the number. These are minor matters intrusted to the wise discretion of the Congress, to be regulated according to the wishes of the country and the convenience and possibilities of business. As a matter of fact and history, both the number and ratio have been often changed. Indeed, at every decennial apportionment since the adoption of the Constitution the ratio has been changed, except in a single instance, and the number of Representatives has been changed on every such occasion, only once receding from a higher to a lower number. I submit in this connection the following table, illustrative of the entire history of the subject in this regard:

*These States admitted subsequently to the apportionment.

The first apportionment was made in advance of any census, upon an assumed estimate of population and by the terms of the Constitution itself. This statement fully sustains the truth of the facts which I have alleged; and it is probable that even now we shall again change both the ratio and the number of Representatives. Indeed, this is contemplated in the bill reported from the Committee on the Census, fixing the number of Representatives at 311 on a ratio of 1 to 158,745 of population. The same feature is also embraced in the bill offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] fixing the number at 301, on a ratio of 1 to 164,018, as likewise in the amendment submitted by him fixing the number at 307, on a ratio of 1 to 160,813 inhabitants. The substitute of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SHERWIN] fixing the number at 319, on a ratio of 1 to 154,764 of population, is also distinguished by the same characteristic. It will be observed, moreover, that every one of these propositions indicates an increase in the number of Representatives. These being matters of discretion, there is room for honest difference of opinion; and aside from any political consideration, it is not strange it should exist. Indeed, it would be passing strange if upon first impression two hundred and ninety-three men should, upon this or any other debatable proposition, entertain exactly the same opinion; and yet, with singular unanimity, all have adopted the principle of increased representation. This much, then, being determined upon, it remains to establish with exactness the number deemed most suitable, either as to convenience of the House or the safety of the public interests. When once the number is fixed, the ratio follows as a matter of course, growing with mathematical certainty out of the relation of the number of Representatives to the whole population of the States used as a basis. The ratio thus ascertained, when applied to the States separately, should yield the quota of each State.

This, sir, would seem to be at first flush but a simple and easy matter of calculation. But here in reality the difficulty begins, and an apparently purely mathematical problem assumes a political aspect more or less difficult of adjustment, and which we are bound in justice respectfully to consider. But I submit, sir, that this might and ought to be done without drawing us into the dangerous vortex of inconsiderate sectional debate. It is evident upon the slightest reflection that the ratio arising from any announced number of Representatives when applied to the census of each State separately will not yield in the aggregate the original number of Representatives agreed on, because of a resulting remainder, which we call a fraction, as to every State. On the first calculation the sum of all these State fractions will be unrepresented, and the deficit thus occurring in the whole number of Representatives must be made up by assigning the missing number among the several States on a different principle. This we do by giving an additional member to a certain number of States, one to each having the largest fractions until the deficit is made up. The fractions of the remaining States both in the aggregate and in detail have no representation in Congress. So far as the even number of members arising on the first calculation is concerned the problem is purely mathematical. It is in dealing with State fractions that political considerations force themselves upon the attention. For every State with an unrepresented fraction loses a portion of its political power in the Congress and the electoral college. Every State whose fraction is represented receives an undue advantage in that it obtains an additional member or elector on a less ratio. And it so happens that these fractions not only thus cause inequality of representation as between the States themselves, but they so group themselves together as likewise in some instances to give a sectional cast to the problem by falling North or South, East or West, and thus impairing the equilibrium of sectional power. For the study of the inquisitive as well as to illustrate this feature of the apportionment, I offer the following table, drawing a comparison in this regard between the North and South, not that I think this disposition should be encouraged, but since it seems to possess a peculiar interest to some, and will therefore more strongly impress them with this characteristic of the apportionment. The same feature no doubt would be developed in a comparison of the East with the West, or an aggregate of democratic States with an aggregate of republican States, which I have not had the patience to make with exactness. It is sufficient to state that in some instances the advantage falls one way and again in another. The following table will make clear this curious fact:

Table showing the losses and gains and relative power of the Northern and Southern States on a representation from 290 to 325.

Hence the political vice of these fractions, which is still further augmented by the fact that with each change of the number of Representatives and consequent varying ratio experiment shows, as in this table, a change in the State fractions and their sectional or political groupings. Thus the vice of the fraction reverts back upon the number of Representatives and immediately affects it also with a political importance. Therefore, one number, aside from ideas purely of business, is a favorite with one section or party and a different number with another section or party. And so groups of States, as well as individual States, must be conciliated in fixing the number of Representatives.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I think it worth while here to state that entire and exact justice in this matter is a physical and mathematical impossibility. It is no new difficulty. It has arisen to harass Congress at every apportionment since the unfortunate spirit of sectionalism first crept in to spoil the harmony of the Republic. This occurrence of unavoidable injustice, (if indeed that be injustice which is unavoidable,) whatever be the number or the ratio adopted, should moderate State and sectional ambition and provoke into the discussion the spirit of a fair compromise. All decorous life is a compromise of conflicting interests. The Constitution is itself the very perfection of political compromise. One further consideration should reconcile States and sections to present but unavoidable disadvantage, and that is, time at last sets all things even. At each apportionment there is a change of scene. The States or sections that suffered loss at the last apportionment doubtless will gain now. Those that gain now may lose ten years hence.

Thus at last, by the practice of a true philosophical and political conservatism, we realize the great American idea of the eventual but certain average of the advantages and disadvantages of government. This is the very perfection of that patience so conducive to good order, the result of centuries of schooling. All that any can be justly called on to endure is an average of evil; all that he has a right to demand is an average of benefits. This is the republic, and in this spirit our differences now should be adjusted. While I support the bill of the committee I am not irrevocably committed to the number 311. I support it because it is the judgment of the majority of the committee, because it increases the number of Representatives 18, and will to that extent add to the power of this House. I support it because it is just to the State of Missouri and recognizes the increase of her population of 447,609 in the last decade and will assign to her an additional Representative. But, sir, when I remember that forty apportionments must yet be made before our Government shall have attained to the happy age of the Roman consulate under pagan auspices; when I reflect that English power and liberty, not yet attaining their zenith, have been slowly aggregating from triumph to triumph and from "precedent to precedent" through the evolutions of eighteen hundred years, and that scarcely one hundred years ago we were her dependent colony; when I turn to the future, bright with the assured hopes of this Christian Republic, based upon the force of law that recognizes the universal brotherhood of man, and hear her "distant footsteps echo down the corridors of time" as she marches with the solemn tread of the centuries, these earnest but futile contests over the gain or loss of a member here or there dwindle into insignificance, and it seems to me we should be able to compose our differences and complete this apportionment in a single hour.

For myself, regarding the matter politically, I shall be satisfied with any number that a majority of this House may deem reasonable and approximately just, since perfection is not attainable.

But, sir, I wish here to state that whatever number may be finally adopted, I am individually in favor of the largest House that will comport with the environment of the present Hall and the economic possibilities of business. There may be pecuniary reasons affecting the questions that would induce some to regard favorably a limited representation, but this in my judgment is a very inconsiderable as well as false economy, and should not weigh for a moment against the higher advantages of a more numerous representation; advantages both moral and political in character. Besides I do not believe that anything is gained, either in time, dispatch of business, faithful attention to duty, or honest consideration of the public interests by having a reduced number of Representatives. I have closely observed the effect of this in the present House, and I here state that of all the scenes of disorder to which I have been a witness, the delay of important measures, the waste of time and inconsiderate action, the majority of instances have not occurred when all the members have been in their places, but on the contrary when absenteeism has reached the extent of from seventy-five to one hundred and fifty vacant seats and small numbers are not propitious. There seems to be born of the occasion a levity of spirit and irritability of temper that are inconsistent with the speedy prosecution of public business, a personal feeling of responsibility to constituency or thoughtful attention to the delicate honors of the hour when national history is being made. And almost universally a period has been put to such scenes by a return of a full House. Shall I not credit the logic of facts and follow where reason leads? Besides, Mr. Speaker, the legislative history of our country will sustain the proposition which I have laid down, and even itself suggests it. We started out under the Constitution, in 1789, with sixty-five members and about three million five hundred thousand people. From then till now we have steadily and gradually progressed, as shown by the census, until we have arrived at a population exceeding fifty millions, and a representation of two hundred and ninety-three members. It has always been recognized by the Congress, and demanded by the country, that the representation of the people on this floor should at each decennial period be made to correspond in some reasonable measure to the increase of population. And in this respect we are yet below the standard deemed prudent for the popular assembly of any European state. We are much below the comparative standard of the earlier Congresses. A ratio of 1 to 30,000, the constitutional minimum and that first adopted, would, on the present basis of 49,369,595 population in the States, give a representation in this House of 1,645. This of course would be extreme, but it indicates what was in the minds of the framers of the Constitution, that the lower House of Congress was intended to be in its fullest sense a popular assembly, the political arena of the people, corresponding in some slight degree to the Athenian Assembly, or the Roman Forum, or the numerous defenders of liberty in the British House of Commons. Doubtless we are limited in number, both by the capacity of the Hall and the ability to hear. These circumstances fix limits beyond which we cannot pass. But we may approach to these limits, and by so doing, while we lose nothing we gain much—a broader base for the pyramid of popular liberty.

In this connection I ask the attention of the House to the following table which I have prepared, showing the number and date of each Congress, the number of members, the ratio, population, number of sessions of each Congress, and the number of days each was in session.

This table reveals some curious and interesting facts. I use it for but one purpose and that is to show the relative efficiency of a smaller and larger number of Representatives. The first twenty Congresses from 1789 to 1829 held forty-four sessions, embracing an aggregate of 5,717 days and an average of 285+ days to each Congress. The average number of members during this period was 142+, and the average of population was 5,908,049. During the second twenty Congresses from 1829 to 1869 there were held forty-five sessions, embracing an aggregate of 6,698 days, and an average of 339+ days to each Congress. The average number of members during this period was 277+, and the average of population was 18,738,459. Thus it is shown that for the first forty years of constitutional government an average number of Representatives of 142 representing an average number of population of but 5,908,049 were in session during each Congress an average number of 285 days, while during the second forty years an average number of 277 members representing an average number of 18,738,459 were in session during each Congress an average number of 334 days. That is, an average excess of 135 members with an average excess of 12,830,410 of inhabitants only consumed a semi-annual average excess of forty-nine days. This gives an average of 36, or a little more than one-third of a day, to each additional member, and a fraction less than four days for each added million of population.

Now, Mr. Speaker, when in connection with these historical figures we consider the fact that the legislative business of a country does in some measure correspond to the number of population and extent of territory, the conclusion is strong in favor of enlarged representation. But looking back on the picture of the thirteen weak States with scarcely 3,500,000 of people and their circumscribed boundaries and demands, and then upon this of thirty-eight States with 50,000,000 population spread out from ocean to ocean and from lakes to gulf, with all their diversified interests, local ambitions, contending aspirations, public business, and private affairs, and remembering that into the latter period which we are comparing were forced the struggling destinies and vast concerns of the grandest drama of civil war that ever sorrowed the vision of any land, the argument is simply overwhelming.

Numbers in the American Congress do add efficiency to business. This House having charge, in the first instance, by right and prescription of the appropriation measures is compelled to do and does more work than the other House of only seventy-six Senators. There is momentum in numbers.

I believe there have been brought before this Congress about eight thousand bills and joint resolutions, showing the amount of business that comes before the House of Representatives in recent years. Yet it remains true that later Congresses with increased representation have given as general and uniform satisfaction in this respect to the country as did former Congresses with smaller numbers. I will not enlarge upon this feature of the system, but content myself with saying that I hope to live to see the day when this Hall, enlarged, will contain four hundred Representatives.

And when that time comes I expect to see smaller districts and confined constituencies represented by men known to all their fellow-citizens in deep, earnest, personal neighborhood sympathy with every man, and representing here not any special class-interest nor any vain and visionary dreams of their own, but the opinions and necessities, the great heart and soul of the brotherhood of mankind, as it is found in the common breast, from the millionaire in his palace to the tramp on the road, the average American citizen represented by the average faithful American Congressman. I believe that a Representative should be so well known, and have the opportunity so well to know the people of his district, that every vote he gives in this House shall be given under an impulse borrowed from home and moved by the hearts and wishes of his people. But this is scarcely possible under the present system. The districts are too large and the population too numerous. Some districts in the State of Missouri are two hundred miles in length, and embrace more territory than do two States of the American Union. The district which I have the honor to represent has three times the population of Nevada, with one Representative and two Senators. It cast in the congressional election of 1878 only four hundred and thirty-four less votes than the aggregate votes of Delaware and Rhode Island, that have three Representatives and four Senators. This cannot be judicious.

Mr. Speaker, there is a very general and growing apprehension among the people of this country that their material interests and liberties are not free from danger in view of the vast accumulation of individual and corporate wealth and power. The shadow of a great fear darkens the land. It may be but the result of undue anxiety. It may be something more. On every side we hear of unions, combinations, and centralization of capital. Great corporations, with insatiate ambition, unrestrained by personal sympathy with the people, are entering into leagues whose aims are measured only by the breadth of the continent and the calculated sufferances of this country. It is said this unseen hand enriches the political pool, that they take a mysterious interest in State Legislatures and the election of Senators and Representatives. It is even hinted that their baleful influence haunts the corridors of this Capitol. Sir, if ever the final contest should come between the liberties and rights of the people of this country on one side, and centralized corporate wealth on the other, it were well for the people in that hour that they were defended on this floor by a numerous representation affected by the warmest sympathies and the most intimate confidence. There is moral as well as physical safety in numbers. Large bodies are less easily corrupted.

But, sir; I turn from these features of this bill to the practical question, are we prepared to make a constitutional apportionment now, and shall we make it? On this point as on the others there is difference of opinion. Gentlemen on the other side of the House in this discussion have taken the position that we cannot either practically or constitutionally make the apportionment now. They have stated their reasons, and that I may do them no injustice I prefer that these shall be again stated in their own language. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR] says:

> I am aware that under the strict letter of the Constitution the census basis is the proper one.
> Now, I am not going to say whether the recent census was a fair one or not. There are many of the returns that cannot be explained upon what was supposed to be reliable history of the events of the past ten years in some of the States. But what I do maintain is, that no man can reconcile the census returns with the votes cast on any basis of fair dealing. It seems to be beyond the power of contradiction that there was gross cheating either in the census or in the voting. Then I ask does it not follow that to have a fair apportionment both of these elements should be taken into account?

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS] made the following statement:

> Mr. Speaker, I do not believe we ought to pass an apportionment bill this session at all. I said on the stump (and I would be an arrant coward if I did not say the same thing here in the presence of the representatives of 50,000,000 people) that I am not satisfied the last census is correct. Take for example the State of South Carolina; I select it only by way of illustration. The population of South Carolina as returned by this census is 995,622. In 1870 it was 705,606, making an increase in round numbers of 290,000.

I say now no State can afford to ask an apportionment founded on any census which is not satisfactory to the great body of the people of the other States. They cannot afford it. This is one reason why I am not in favor of an apportionment bill at this session of Congress.

* * * * * * *

But to pass from that. Another reason is, that I am not satisfied with reference to the representation under the fourteenth amendment. I say when the law was passed by which the census was taken it ought to have provided some means by which we could have ascertained the facts as provided under the fourteenth amendment. This it omitted to do. It is nothing more than right it should have been done.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. CROWLEY] said:

For myself, Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of having one of the committees of this Congress, or a select committee, if you please, raised for that purpose, which shall investigate the whole question of disqualification, either educational or property, in all the States of the Union where constitutional prohibitions against the right of suffrage are alleged to exist; and I would have this committee look into this whole question and report to Congress what qualifications or disqualifications exist in all sections of the country to deprive citizens of the right to vote; and then when we have a full report of the disqualifications, either educational or property, or whether by violence and oppression men are denied the right of suffrage, and all of the facts before us, it will then be within the power of Congress to go to work and consider an apportionment bill which can be based upon justice, equity, and the Constitution, based upon the voters of this country as well as upon the numbers.

* * * * * * *

Only four weeks of this session of Congress are left. Certainly within that time the qualifications or disqualifications existing in ten States of this Union, or the fraud, violence, and intimidation alleged to exist in other States, cannot be properly investigated and considered, nor can we have all the facts in such proper shape before the House as to permit an apportionment bill based upon voters as well as upon numbers.

Now, Mr. Speaker, these extracts from speeches of gentlemen on the other side fairly present to this House and the country the essential points of difference. On this side of the House it is believed that we have the necessary data and should make the apportionment now. On the other side this is controverted and it is sought to postpone the apportionment. The objections are two. The first lies against the correctness of the enumeration. The second impeaches its constitutionality. On either or both grounds it is held to be fatally defective. Let us carefully weigh these objections. They are raised under section 2 of article 14 of the amendments. That section is as follows:

Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State.

Excluding Indians not taxed. But—

When the right to vote at any election for the choice of electors for President and Vice-President of the United States, Representatives in Congress, the executive and judicial officers of a State, or the members of the Legislature thereof, is denied to any of the male inhabitants of such State, being twenty-one years of age, and citizens of the United States, or in any way abridged, except for participation in rebellion, or other crime, the basis of representation therein shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens twenty-one years of age in such State.

But this section of the fourteenth article must be taken in connection with the second section of article 1 of the original Constitution, a part of which is in this language:

The actual enumeration shall be made within three years after the first meeting of the Congress of the United States, and within every subsequent term of ten years, in such manner as they shall by law direct.

These sections together, and not separately, present the constitutional law of the case. In this light we will consider the objections presented and in their order. Is the tenth census under which we seek to make this apportionment correct? Is it constitutional? The first is a question of fact; the second, of construction, involving also in the sequel the duty of Congress. As to the first, what is the fact required? It is the basis of apportionment. What is the basis of apportionment? It is primarily the whole number of the population of all the States, excluding Indians not taxed. This basis is liable to be affected by the number of persons disfranchised for unconstitutional cause. This latter idea, however, we will for the present eliminate from the argument, to be again considered in connection with the question of constitutionality. It remains, then, to test the correctness of the census. This involves two elements—the perfection of the law and the faithfulness of its execution. Is the law under which the tenth census was taken wisely adapted to accomplish the end with accuracy? This law is embraced in the act passed by the Forty-fifth Congress, approved March 3, 1879, and in the act amendatory thereof passed at the present Congress, approved April 20, 1880.

These provisions of law are the result of mature consideration of the most experienced minds, adopted with a knowledge and in the light of history from the institutions of Solon and the first Roman census by Servius Tullius through the later experiments of western Europe and the illustration of the nine preceding censuses of our own country. The framers of the law thus had the benefit not only of their own experienced judgment, but of the wisdom and mistakes of all the past. We might, therefore, expect and we shall accordingly find the wisest and best law ever devised for the purpose, in this country at least. In the first place, a general superintendent is provided for, having the direction and control of the whole work. This insures every advantage supposed to lie in individuality of purpose, unity of action, and great personal responsibility. Under the general superintendent is a corps of supervisors, limited to one hundred and fifty, directing the work in reasonably small districts, being subdivisions of the States. These are responsible to the superintendent. Under the supervisors and appointed by them is the army of enumerators doing the actual work of numbering the people. These are responsible directly to the superintendent, and subject to removal for proper cause. These, then, are the officers. All discharge their duty under oath. The enumeration is to be made in one month from the 1st day of June, 1880, thus providing against the frauds or mistakes of delay. The enumeration districts are circumscribed in territory and limited in population to 4,000; and the enumerator, being a resident of his district, the advantage of intimate and personal acquaintance is secured. The enumerator is compelled to visit every household in his district, and in the event of failure to find the people at home, to ascertain the facts from their neighbors or other reliable sources. The age, name, sex, and color of every individual is to be noted.

The facts are to be preserved by writing on original lists. On completion of the first enumeration a true copy of these lists is to be filed with certain named officers in the county or parish of the enumerator for public inspection. These lists designate the name, age, sex, and color. On sufficient notice given to the public by advertisement, the enumerator is for five days, at certain specified and convenient places, required to be present to review his work on suggestion and revise and correct his lists. After the completion and verification of his work in this manner, the original lists are to be certified to the supervisors, whence they are forwarded for file to the office of the superintendent. This is the system. Mr. Speaker, could any devisement of law to ascertain the truth be more careful, accurate, and searching? It is the very perfection of intelligent ingenuity. Nothing more could be desired; but at last, not less depends on faithful execution of law than on law itself.

For forms of government let fools contest,
What's best administered is best.

What guarantee of faithful and honest execution have we? Every guarantee. The method of selecting the officers and the officers themselves as well as the checks of the law and the means of swift detection of carelessness or fraud. The name of General Walker is itself a guarantee of a prudent and honest supervision of the entire work and verification of its results. Had we no other security for its correctness we should confidently repose in his integrity and ability. For I undertake to say of him, which, however, is useless in view of his standing with this House, and his well-earned national reputation, (and he is no political friend of mine,) that no man stands higher or fairer in personal character or special fitness for the technical duties of his office, or is more unimpeachable before this country as a man of integrity, unbiased judgment, business qualifications, and statistical learning than General Walker. So much for the chief. What of the subordinates? The intermediate grade of officers are the one hundred and fifty supervisors. For them I say, also, both from deduction and the record, that the country and Congress has every reason for the completest confidence in their honest and efficient discharge of duty. I know that they were in the main suggested by General Walker, and a scrupulous regard for his own name and reputation as well as the interests of the country forces us to credit their selection with an honest and intelligent discrimination as to character and fitness. In the performance of this duty his ear was always open to prudent advisement by the members of this House. But the Chief Executive made the actual appointments. Neither in this matter can we consider him inattentive to duty or the public interest. The appointment of supervisors is to be confirmed by the Senate.

It is to be presumed, therefore, that the President in sending down the names took into consideration not only his own reputation and the general weal but also the political opposition of the Senate, through the crucible of whose careful inspection, if not also partisan criticism, every name must pass. Thus the original list of supervisors was made out and appointed. The Senate considered them carefully upon personal knowledge and upon information. Most were confirmed without objection. Some were rejected. Others were appointed in their stead, till the Senate and the Executive concurred. Thus every precaution was thrown around the selection of the supervisors, and while the larger half were republicans, as was to be expected, still many were democrats. No complaint of record appears against their honesty, and even a partisan press has scarcely criticised their efficiency. But the basal and most numerous grade of officers in this column of strength are the enumerators. They are appointed by the supervisors. Reasoning from the character of the appointing power, we expect in them fitness, industry, clerical qualification, intelligence, and honesty, in reference to which qualities they are required to be appointed without regard to political affiliation. In the absence of proof to the contrary, we conclusively presume they were so selected and appointed. Thus from the central power to the circumference of final action the machinery is as perfect as human ingenuity can make. The law is wise, the officers efficient. What of the execution? Briefly, I state the work was done by the officers named, each in his sphere, in the time and in the manner required. In one month the whole population of the United States was photographed into the tenth census with guarantees of accuracy of form and perfection of lineament never before devised. This is not all. This census was taken under the corrective influence of partisan criticism and in the blazing light of political passion heated to whiteness during the recent presidential contest.

In the very hour of the taking of the census its correctness in certain localities was impeached on the very ground that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR] now impeaches it, an assumed disproportion between the population returned and the last vote, and on the principle mentioned by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. CALKINS,] an apparent unnatural increase as compared with the census of 1870. Especially was this suspicion made forcible against the State of South Carolina, then as now by way of illustration. Now, Mr. Speaker, I am no champion of South Carolina. She is not specially endeared to me any further than in common with the other colonies around which cluster the common, deathless glories of the Revolution. I trust, sir, I shall always be able to rise above the Sumter of 1861, to see the Moultrie of 1776, and to turn from the conspicuous names of the present to her Marions and her Sumters of the past. I am no more her friend than I am the friend of Massachusetts or Vermont. I am an American citizen, and as such have a vested right in all States and a heritage in their blended power and glory. But I am specially the friend of the tenth census, believing in its truthfulness. The objections which are here stated against the correctness of the enumeration of South Carolina were made to the Superintendent of Census at a time when they might be of some legal force and practical avail. General Walker heard the objections. He sent out special agents and quasi-detectives to investigate the matter. They did so effectually, and made their report to the Superintendent, on which he has sent to this House and the country a special manifesto, on which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FINLEY] has just now so ably commented. What is the result? The original lists are verified in every essential. The homes of South Carolina and the mortuary record of her graveyards show that the first enumeration was honestly and fairly made. This is the official record. South Carolina is the only State whose census by verification has been placed completely beyond all manner of doubt and even suspicion.

I remember also that objection was made by the citizens of Saint Louis that the enumeration of that city was not satisfactory. General Walker accordingly ordered a second enumeration by a new set of officers, and the additional lists are on file in his office, showing a slight increase. So was he ready in any other case to verify the work on reasonable representation of probable error. Then was the time to raise objections now raised here. Why was it not done if deemed desirable? It is now too late. We have selected our own witnesses; we have sent them out to gather the facts; their testimony is in; the case is closed; judgment must follow. From all the guarantees surrounding the tenth census I say it ought to be correct. Speaking by the record, which is conclusive, I say it is correct. I here call the attention of the House to the report of the Superintendent to the honorable Secretary of the Interior of his completed work, and which has been transmitted to this House. It shows in detail the population of every State and the grand aggregate, which is 49,369,595.

Against this solemn record what valid objection is opposed. When honorable members rise here in their places and say or intimate that this certified result is at variance with the actual facts, on what ground, reason, or proofs do they base their impeachment? In justice to this House and the country, considering the gravity of the subject, facts, not surmises, ought to be given. It will not answer, Mr. Speaker, when this census is attacked to speak of it in that vague, indefinite way in which we denominate the weather, as "it," meaning nothing, or losing ourselves in the inexpressible idea of the complex unit of nature. Neither will it suffice to bring to our aid the testimony of the mysterious but ubiquitous "they say." What we want is solid facts that will satisfy a reasonable mind. The census is not a sentient thing that by some mysterious power of mobility can transpose its own figures so as to make them lie, but is the numerical representation of a fixed truth—the number of inhabitants in the country. It did not take itself. It was taken by agents. It is the result of the work of men acting under solemn oath. He who attacks the census attacks the men who took it. He who impeaches the census impeaches either the honesty or efficiency of the officers who made the enumeration or who controlled it. Is it the Superintendent? Then let not his exalted position shield him through indefinite expressions from the direct charge in a matter so grave. But the probity of his character and his distinguished ability protect him from even an unfriendly intimation.

Is it the supervisors that are at fault? They are but one hundred and fifty. Give the name and circumstances; or may be the assumed fault lies with the enumerators. If so, name the man, his district, State, and county, and the facts of his carelessness or fraud; otherwise, leave this hard-worked and badly paid class of officials in possession of their honest names and the undisturbed consciousness of having done their duty well, as the files in the office of the Superintendent show. They cannot defend themselves here, and I insist, as a Representative in part of the State of Missouri, that the enumerators of my State and my district shall not be injuriously characterized in any such way. If anything is wrong, "let facts be submitted to a candid world," or, in their absence, let the enumeration stand. Suspicion ought not to unsettle so grave a historical fact. Sir, report may be valid logic to determine the councils of the "cross-roads," and the voice of rumor may be potential at an evening tea-party to blast an innocent reputation or slaughter some absent victim, but neither have place in this Hall to cast a shadow on truth or affect the grave destinies of the nation. This, sir, is the forum whence the force of law and the stern logic of facts alone sway the controversy.

But, Mr. Speaker, admitting for a moment that the census is incorrect, do the gentlemen on the other side propose a constitutional and practical remedy? In my judgment they do not. The remedy proposed is to reinvestigate the facts and verify the census by committees of this House sent out for the purpose. This is not a constitutional method. If the census can be changed in one instance by the action of committees it may be changed in all. There is no limit to this process if the first step be permissible. Indeed this is broadly stated to be the object of sending out the committees. The final result would be that we should have an apportionment based on information obtained through committees of Congress. Now, these committees would act under authority and process fixed by resolution of this House without the joint action or consent of the Senate or President. But the Constitution prescribes that the census shall be taken "in such manner as they (the Congress) shall by law direct." Now, a law is the production of the concurrent action of Senate and House, with the active or passive approval of the Executive. The proposed method is by resolution; the constitutional method is by law. Both cannot be correct. On the well-known principle of interpretation, expressio unius, exclusio alterius, the Constitution must prevail; and no census is valid unless wholly taken under law, and no apportionment based on a census otherwise taken, either in whole or in part, would have any constitutional force or effect whatever. This is almost self-evident. The direction is imperative, and there is no escape from it. The enumeration must be made wholly under and in pursuance of law; but the proposed method is entirely visionary and impracticable both as to time and efficiency. The gentleman from New York [Mr. CROWLEY] proposes to send committees through at least ten States and as many others as the circumstances might indicate.

He frankly admits it cannot be done at this Congress. The matter, then, if postponed to the ensuing Congress, could not come up for consideration before December, 1881, in the absence of an extra session. The committees then would not enter upon the investigation, in all probability, before the vacation of 1882. If they did their work faithfully, they might verify to some extent the enumeration in a few States—certainly not ten—in the course of a year or two; for, Mr. Speaker, when once you enter upon this task few can guess its magnitude. You could not stop with South Carolina, which seems to be an objective point. When your committees have wandered vainly through the rice fields of that State, they would then have to travel over the sugar plantations of Louisiana and the cotton fields of Mississippi. They could not pause here. They would be compelled to investigate the workshops and factories of Rhode Island and Massachusetts and the great founderies and iron manufactories and coal mines of Pennsylvania.

This is not all. They would have to go West. They would be called to Saint Louis to add another fifty thousand to the lists of that city, and then to countless ambitious towns and cities that might think it possible to "wine and dine" your committees into a correction of their fancied grievances. Rivalries, local jealousies, and partisanship would spread the work. You would have to send to Chicago a committee to verify her lists; for I have heard and have read in the papers of the West that Chicago is credited with an excess of 100,000 population. I have heard that her enumerators listed the employés of all the great railroads centering there, regardless of their place of residence. I have heard that they followed the Missouri, Kansas and Texas Railroad across the State of Missouri, through the Indian Territory, as far south as Dennison, Texas, listing the employés and section hands and idle and homeless persons along the road. I have heard said that the hotel registers whose pages were filled up by the thousands of visitors to the Chicago convention were carefully preserved and copied into the lists. I have heard said that they even went out into their beautiful graveyards, and taking by a literal interpretation what was said of one eighteen hundred years ago, "He is not dead but sleepeth," with pious duty they duplicated the names upon the grave-stones and cashed a sight draft for 40,000 souls upon resurrection morn.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not say these things are true. I do not say I believe they are true. I do not ask this House to believe them. I feel a just pride in the City by the Lake with her 503,304 people, as I do in the City by the Father of Waters with her 350,522 people. I only wish she was greater and richer. She is one of the jewels of the West; and just as I would protect her fair fame against such idle rumors by interposing the conclusive testimony of the tenth census, so I would shield the State of South Carolina or other States from the unjust imputation of fraud on the census by her supervisors and enumerators. But more than all, I would save this House and country the inevitable disaster of the delay that will bring us into the shadow of another presidential election with the census incomplete and the electoral college in dispute, or from the uncertainty of an apportionment based upon an unconstitutional enumeration made by committees and poisoned with a just suspicion of partisanship, which must tincture the work of any committee under this system. Sir, when you refuse to receive as final the results of the census, you open a flood-gate you will never be able to shut down; you are taking the first step upon a pathway that has no guide-board to point the next place of stopping; you are drifting out upon a sea with no known port of future entry; you are invoking the fell spirit of a confusion of which the Orient never dreamed in that day when it so soon forgot its own to learn so many foreign languages. Who can predict what might be the event? I do not want to see that state of things; I do not want to be instrumental in a work that may produce such a result or even cast a shadow across the growing peace and harmony and prosperity of the Union to-day.

In adherence to the Constitution, Mr. Speaker, there is dignity, honor, and safety. It requires the census to be taken under and in pursuance of "law." Every census has been heretofore taken by law. It cannot be taken by resolution through committees, either general or special, for that purpose.

Now, sir, it only remains to consider the objection that the present census returns cannot be the basis of a constitutional apportionment because no account is taken of the question of disfranchisement.

On this point, Mr. Speaker, I am relieved from any extended discussion by the able and learned arguments made to this House by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ROBINSON.] This House and the country are indebted to him for that exhaustive argument. It is, in my judgment, a complete and unanswerable refutation of the objection. The disfranchisement mentioned in the second section of the fourteenth article heretofore cited, in order to affect the primary basis of apportionment, which in the first instance is the whole "number" of population of the States, must be by State action, as declared in the first section of the said article:

> No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States.

Now, sir, consider this section with the second section which declares that "if the right of the persons named therein to vote is denied or abridged for any other than the cause therein specified then the basis of representation therein (the State) shall be reduced," &c. The basis of representation shall be reduced. On what account? Denial of the right to vote or its abridgment. Denial or abridgment how and by whom? Not by a mob without authority. Not by personal intimidation. Not by individual "violence and oppression" without the connivance of the State. Not by the electioneering efforts of some unscrupulous partisan to overreach and intimidate a simple-minded voter. Not by anxious and unjust interference with individual freedom of action as has been charged against some of the corporations of Pennsylvania and some of the New England States, may be unjustly. Not by any of these or kindred efforts such as what in common parlance is termed "bulldozing." How then? By the State. In what manner by the State? By making and enforcing a law. The disfranchisement must be authorized by the State by law. The law must be then enforced. How enforced? By officers of the State of course.

Now, Mr. Speaker, who is to determine whether there be such law on the statute-book of any State, or its relation to individual right? Certainly if by any census officer, then by the enumerator, who chronicles the fact, for the law has to be applied to every person disfranchised. But if by the superintendent or supervisors the case is scarcely altered. Can it be that the determination of a question of such vast importance, involving an interpretation of the Constitution, has been so loosely lodged in such hands? Sir, I trust the liberties of the people of this country and the validity of the electoral college is not held or maintained by an authority so uncertain, to say the least of it. It cannot be. It is absurd.

No, Mr. Speaker, this question of disfranchisement which is to be settled by interpretation of State law in reference to the United States Constitution must be passed on either by the courts or Congress. I think first by the courts. This is most reasonable. It is more analogous to the other provisions of the Constitution. If by the courts, then the Congress did well to ignore the question in the matter of the census. For no such law of any State has been so passed on by the courts of the United States or adjudged unconstitutional.

But if the question is to be settled by Congress it cannot be certainly by this House, as the gentleman from New York has suggested, through committees. It must at least be done prudently. It must be done by legislative adjudication, by a law of Congress declaring the State law unconstitutional. For the census must be in this as other matters taken in pursuance of "law." And, sir, this is the view heretofore entertained by Congress. The debates of the Forty-first Congress, in anticipation of the census of 1870, clearly show this Congress must act by law. But Congress refused so to act in 1869, and the census of 1870 was taken, as this has been, on the basis of numbers only. The RECORD will also show that before the passage of the law of March 3, 1879, under which the present census is taken, the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX,] in an able speech, called the attention of the House to the matter and urged action on the part of Congress. Again Congress refused. On what ground?

Mr. Speaker, it cannot be supposed for a moment that the Congress refused to do its duty. It refused to act for the reasons stated by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ROBINSON,] and for which it still refuses to act, because the Congress is not satisfied that any State is so unmindful of the liberties of its citizens as to deny or abridge their right to vote for unconstitutional cause. By non-action Congress has determined there are no such State laws, and if we have to wait till the period mentioned by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. CALKINS,] the passage of such a law by Congress before this census can be completed and this apportionment made, then we must wait till Congress changes its judgment in the premises. When will it do this? Mr. Speaker, this is the end of the argument. The census officers possess no authority to declare on this question of disfranchisement. The courts have not done so, and we cannot regulate their action. They are beyond the influence of Congress. Congress has not acted and will not act in the matter because a majority of the House and Senate believe (for I cannot think they would neglect so grave a duty) that no State in this Union has "made or enforced any law by which the privileges or immunities of the United States have been abridged." The census is, therefore, constitutional as well as correct, and the apportionment can and ought to be made now.

And now, Mr. Speaker, allow me to say that I am sorry that there has been dragged into a simple business matter like this any feeling born of the years that lie between 1861 and 1865. That is a period through which we passed with varying fortunes and to which we may all look back with historical interest and profit. But let us keep our hearts this side of 1865. What have the events of that day to do with the honest taking of the census of the people of this country or fixing the number of Representatives and the ratio of representation? Sir, the land needs rest, not only from war, but the war of words; time for hearts to heal as well as wounds; for kind thoughts to spring between the States as well as flowers to grow over their battle-fields. Friendship at last is stronger than force, and soft accents persuade where threats have failed. Hatred makes a poor argument, and anger never was convinced. But reason supplemented with good-will is as irresistible as sunshine on the landscape.

To me, sir, the pine and palm are but trees drawing sustenance from a common soil. The Hudson and Potomac are only rivers flowing through different scenes from one continent to one sea. I wear no northern shield or southern cross. My talisman is the unbroken field of national blue where all the State stars shine—individuality of spheres but a unity of sky. My native State lies intermediate between extremes, where nature teaches tolerance in the rich and boundless West, on whose bosom, heaving with the dreams of empire, the tides of immigration alike from North and South as well as Europe meet and mingle in undistinguishing philanthropy and commercial friendship. There all provincialisms disappear, and local prejudices are lost in the structure of a new society. We take no interest in the historic jealousies, soon to cease, of North or South but to regret them. What to the great West can be a name more or less in Congress or the electoral college for a few years, when from all the world is pouring into her heart the blood of empire?

Mr. Speaker, let me say, in conclusion, with the kindest feelings for every State, a pride in and love of those States, that so far as my State is concerned the day of bitterness is over, and the deep waves of passion that swept over us in the hour of storm have reflowed to their former path, and never more will roll over the peaceful bosom of Missouri. Sir, we could not afford to be enemies there; neither can we here. We were peculiarly situated. We were not separated as States, but divided as families. Ours was a civil and not sectional war.

Missouri sent into the Union Army more than one hundred thousand men, who served within the borders and beyond the limits of the State. Many of them sealed their devotion to their country by the sacrifice of life, which is the highest test of love. They were brave, true-hearted men; their blood has reddened the soil from the border to the eastern mountains; from Wilson's Creek and Pea Ridge to Antietam and Gettysburgh. And wherever the flag of the Union shall float, on sea or land, and as long, it will tell the legend of their fame. Some of them are honored members of this House. One, Governor Phelps, amid the plaudits of his fellow-citizens, has just quitted the great responsibilities of the governorship of the State, which he has borne with eminent dignity and enviable success for four years. Another, Governor Crittenden, recently a member of this House, has just been inducted into the honors of that high office, with great promise to the State and distinguished credit to himself. Many others are ably filling the highest judicial and political offices in the State.

Missouri also sent into the confederate service a noble band of most excellent young men—variously estimated at from seventy-five to one hundred thousand—men as brave as ever endured the hardships of camp or march, possessed of as honest a purpose, of as determined and heroic courage—whatever may now be said of that unfortunate conflict—as any who ever trod a battle-field in this or other lands; soldiers whose love of a losing cause and devotion to a conceived duty has lent even to civil war a tinge of bloody glory that will shine in mournful brightness till the light has faded from the last page of American history.

Some of these are now serving with distinction in this House, and two are in the Senate of the United States. Their councils are as prudent as their swords were bright. No word has escaped from them, nor will, that might have a tendency to recultivate the field of strife or open again the healed wounds of war. You cannot write the history of one of these parties without writing the history of the other. Their courage is mutual, their devotion equal, though honors may not be esteemed correlative.

But when the armed conflict had ceased—

When war's wild, wintry blast was blown,
And gentle peace returning,
With many a sweet babe fatherless,
And many a widow mourning—

these men came back from either side to mingle in fraternal strife amid the rich fields of their native or adopted State, as they had bravely and honestly fought under opposing flags on the battle-field. They are brothers to-day, partners in business, and rivals only in the offices of friendship and duty to the State. They are men now as they were soldiers once. The plow, the machine, the scythe, the rake, the shop, the forge, these things now engage our peaceful attention, and we only read those other events in the spirit of history, and never teach the bitterness of that hour to the children of the rising generation.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia, obtained the floor.

Mr. FRYE. If the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HAMMOND] will yield to me for a moment——

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. I will do so.

CONFERENCE OF REPUBLICAN MEMBERS.

Mr. FRYE. It was understood that the republican members of this House would have a conference in this Hall immediately after the recess to-day; but so many of them have left the Hall that it is deemed better not to have it to-day, but they will have a conference in this Hall to-morrow night.

Mr. McMAHON. "Caucus," you mean.

Mr. FRYE. The democrats call it a caucus.

REMONETIZATION OF SILVER.

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a report of the Secretary of State, in response to a resolution addressed to him by the House of Representatives on the 31st of January ultimo, on the subject of international action for the restoration of silver to full use as money.

The prospect of an early international conference, promising valuable results in accordance with the interests of this country, is such that I recommend to the immediate attention of Congress an appropriation providing for the proper representation of this Government at such conference.

R. B. HAYES.

WASHINGTON, February 17, 1881.

The message, with the accompanying document, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. KENNA, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the House of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same.

A bill (H. R. No. 2331) granting pensions to the widow and minor children of Michael Meenan, deceased.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. PRICE from attendance on the session of the House this evening.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. DEUSTER asked and obtained unanimous consent for the withdrawal from the files of the House of the papers in the case of A. H. Von Luethwitz; no adverse report.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HUBBELL. I desire now to call up from the Speaker's table the report of the Committee on Appropriations, just brought in, on the amendments of the Senate to the bill making appropriations for pensions, and ask that it be considered and adopted at this time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred House bill No. 6532, making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the year ending June 30, 1882, together with the amendments of the Senate thereto, having considered the same, beg leave to report as follows:

They recommend concurrence in the amendments of the Senate numbered 2 and 3; they recommend non-concurrence in the amendments numbered 1 and 4.

Mr. HUBBELL. I ask that this report be adopted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The amendments will be read, and the Chair will put the question separately on each.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 1:

On page 1 strike out all after the word "separately," in line 18, to and including line 20.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. In this amendment the committee recommend non-concurrence.

The amendment was not concurred in.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 2:

On page 1, at the end of line 22, insert the following:

"Provided, That a fee of $1, and no more, shall be paid to the examining surgeon for each examination of a pensioner as provided by law, except when the examination is made by a board of surgeons, in which case the fees now allowed by law shall be paid."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. In this amendment the Committee on Appropriations recommend concurrence.

The amendment was concurred in.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 3:

On page 1, after line 22, insert the following:

"That the following sums be, and the same are hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1881, namely:

"For pensions for Army invalids, widows, minors, and dependent relatives, including arrears, survivors of the war of 1812, and widows of the war of 1812, $17,692,031.69: Provided, That the amount expended for each of the above items shall be accounted for separately.

"For Navy pensions to invalids, widows, minors, and dependent relatives, $560,274.99: Provided, That the appropriations aforesaid for Navy pensions shall be paid from the income of the Navy pension fund, so far as the same may be sufficient for that purpose: And provided further, That the amount expended for each of the above items shall be accounted for separately.

"For fees for examining surgeons as provided by the several acts of Congress, $30,000."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. In this amendment the Committee on Appropriations recommend concurrence.

The amendment was concurred in.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment number 4:

At the end of the bill add the following:

"SEC. 2. All pensions payable, or to be paid under this act, to pensioners who are inmates of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers shall be paid to the treasurer or treasurers of said home, to be disbursed for the benefit of the pensioners under regulations to be established by the managers of the home; said payment to be made by the pension agent upon a certificate of the proper officer of the home that the pensioner is an inmate thereof and is still living. Any balance of the pension which may remain at the date of the pensioner's discharge shall be paid over to him; and in case of his death at the home, the same shall be paid to the widow or minor children under sixteen years of age, if any there be."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. In this amendment the Committee on Appropriations recommend non-concurrence.

The amendment was not concurred in.

Mr. HUBBELL. There is a further amendment—an amendment to the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the title the words "and for other purposes."

The amendment was concurred in.

Mr. HUBBELL. I move to reconsider the votes upon concurring or non-concurring in these amendments, respectively, and that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the House adopted the report of the conference committee on the Indian appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion to reconsider was made and laid on the table.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I believe I am entitled to the floor.

Mr. HUNTON. I ask the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HAMMOND] to yield to me, that I may make a motion for a recess.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia, I will yield for that purpose. I understand that an order has been made for an evening session.

Mr. HUNTON. I move that the House take a recess until half past seven o'clock this evening.

Mr. SIMONTON. Pending that motion, I move that the House adjourn.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. WARD, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (S. No. 1070) granting a pension to Jacob H. Eppler; and

A bill (S. No. 1802) granting a pension to Ann M. Paulding.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. KITCHIN, until Tuesday next, on account of sickness in his family;

To Mr. OSCAR TURNER, for the session of to-night; and

To Mr. JOHNSTON, for to-night's session, on account of lameness.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. I have consented, at the request of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. HUNTON,] to yield to a motion to take a recess, with the understanding that when the apportionment bill shall be taken up again I shall be entitled to the floor. Am I right?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Certainly.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I ask unanimous consent to take up Senate bill No. 562. It is a bill granting a pension——

Mr. SIMONTON. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and ten minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.
